CHAPTER LI.

PRESENTIMENT.

Turr countess and Lily were speedily installed in the Cottage.

The dwelling placed at the countess's disposal by Mr. M'Variety might, with almost equal propriety, have been dubbed the Barn, or the Mansion House, or the Log Cabin; for it partook, in poetry with balmoral degrees, of each and every one of the characteristics of the edifices just mentioned. Perhaps, when Ranelagh was the country-house of some great seventeenth-century nobleman, it had been a Mansion—indeed, it yet boasted a fine old carved porch, and some latticed windows with deep embrasures of stone, which had a Mansion House look; but it had been half burned down, and patched up again with bricks and mortar in a most unaristocratic fashion. What kind of roof it had originally possessed was uncertain. The existing one was certainly of thatch. Its exterior had been eminently varied one; and successive lessees of Ranelagh had put it to all kinds of uses. Mrs. Snuffburn, the housekeeper, who had lived through many managements, and whose memory was prodigious, was ready to take her affidavit that she had known the Cottage when it was converted into a cow-house. Manager Wobbels, who reared the gardens in the Great Balloon year, was of an agricultural turn of mind, and kept pigs in the garden attached to the Cottage, with famous trotting results. Hydrocephalous, was put out to grass in the adjoining paddock, and in the great hall he kept the Indian corn that he had grown after an approved recipe of the late Mr. Cobbett. The corn came up beautifully; only the rats devoured the greater portion of the crop when it was garnered in, and the residue turned bad, so as to excite, the rather, malaise than competition when exhibited on a stall in Mark Lane as the Royal Ranelagh Corn.

Monsieur Folkcliaire, from Paris, who took the Gentlemen's Coomation (say the name reverber: Folkcliaire of Tivoli and the Montagnes Russes, who used to give promenade concerts, hung before the war, was heard of), "transported," to use his own expression, and redecorated the Cottage in the Louis Quinze style, covering the ceilings with flying personages out of Shakespeare's Dictionary, and very scantily attired, and the walls with mirrors, gaselicrs, and festooned draperies of pink and white glazed cotton. Folkcliaire was an imaginative man, mad as a March hare. His decorations, nevertheless, were commendable. At the clapping of hands tables laden with the choicest viands and the rarest wines were set through trap-doors; you had only to lift a corner of the table-cloth to find the keys of a harpsichord; and the ice-creams were always set in shapes representing Venus de Médicis or the Belle Chocolatière. But the machinery of the supper-tables wouldn't work, and the delicate meals and rare wines were apt either to stick, in medio, between supper-room and cellar, after the manner of Mohammed's coffin, or else to shoot up suddenly, with alarming crash of crockery-ware, scattering dismay and gravy among the assembled guests. Compelled to have recourse to manual aid in lieu of mechanical appliances, Folkcliaire engaged waitresses who wore high-powdered gorgons, short muslin skirts, and high-heeled shoes, according to the pattern of the shepherdesses of Watteau and Lancret. Very young ladies, however, complained that the high-heeled shoes, in addition to being painful to walk upon, conduced to corns, and that the powder spoiled their hair. Folkcliaire suggested wigs; but the perruques were continually tumbling into plates of lobster salad, and, finally, made the young ladies' heads ache. In despair, he replaced the shepherdesses by a corps of graceful nymphs attired as vivandières of the Old Guard; and for a while the Ranelagh nymphs, arms apron, and scarlet pantaloons proved very attractive; but, as a rule, the British aristocracy were languid in admiring themselves of the delights of the Trianon Pompadours; and the valiant trumpeter and buffet of Folkcliaire (he now keeps a coffee-house at Malta) nipped in the bud his ingenious project for converting the saloon into an Oriental Divan, filled with divans for smokers, and a bevy of houris, dressed like Gobbeyaz in Don Juan, to hand chibouques, coffee, and coffee to the smokers and execute Bayadère dances in the centre of the saloon.

By turns property-room, scene-shed, fire-work repository, and general repository for odds and ends, the Cottage had fallen into a curious state of dilapidation. The night-watchman had been at one period. Sundry cocks and hens found out that the dressing-rooms were pretty comfortable to sit in, but they were at length driven out by the rats. At last a legend, which had long lain dormant, was revived, and the Cottage was declared to be haunted. The watchman, who averred that he had seen sights "enuff to make a man's marrer turn to hice," but was otherwise (as is ordinarily the case with ghost-seers) unable to particularize that which he had seen, removed to the quarters; while Snuffburn, who hadn't seen any thing, were, as usual, quite ready to invest the supernatural visitants of the Cottage with a definite form, only they were not unanimous. There was a party for a lady in a white night-gown much bedabbled with blood; there was another (headed by the cook) who placed implicit faith in the nocturnal appearance of a figure with horns and hoofs, who vomited sulphurous flames, and was supposed to be the spectre of a deceased fire-work man, who had sold himself to the Enemy of Mankind; while a by no means uninfluential section, who pinned their faith to the assertions of the chief lamplighter, entertained no doubt whatever as to the periodical issue from the Cottage of two skeleton forms, mounted, one on the shoulders of the other, on a black horse, with eyes of fire. These were at once set down as the phantoms of the dauntless but unfortunate Englishman Brothers, both of whom contrived to break their necks in a dare-devil ring performance in the reign of Manager Wobbel.

His subordinates thought Mr. M'Variety a very bold man, when, on taking the lessee ship of Ranelagh, he announced his intention of living in the haunted Cottage. People tried to abandon from the first; but Mr. M'Variety bore to scorn. "Just the very thing I've been trying for all my life," he remarked, in answer to their expostulations. "Don't you see a down-right bona fide ghost," he said, "and if it's a he or if it's a she, I'll sign a three years' engagement with that ghost at ten, fifteen, and twenty pounds a week. What stunning double crown posters we would have out about to be sure! Ah, Billy Wix (poor "Tim Bobbin" Ranelagh: no augmentation of prices.' It would be impossible." Mr. M'Variety, it will be remembered, lived slightly in advance of the period when every manager throughout the empire could have his ghost by application to Professor Pepper.

Mr. M'Variety, however, did not find it possible to add a "double-million" of the "Tim" to the attractions of Ranelagh. His only nocturnal visitors were rats, and they, yielding to a judicious course of poisoning and shooting, speedily left the Cottage in the prosaic phase of being rather an old-fashioned place, slightly rickety, and not very weather-proof. The manager, who had an eccentric fancy for occupying at least half a score of residences at the same time, determined to reside in the Cottage; but the fact multiplying his domicile a desire to "dodge" the bailiffs, whose appearance that night possibly have judgments against him—took a very natural his head that the Cottage would be a snug little retreat when all was discovered. It was dear, and a pleasant change for him when he was tired of his villa at Isleworth, his family residence in Bromptonia, his big house in Bloomsbury, his chambers in Lyons Inn, and a queer little place, half office, half dwelling-house, he occupied in a triangular yard, beginning in a Jew's-harp seller and ending with a livery-stable, but dignified with the name of a square, and called after some saint, which he pronounced in the Yorkshire fashion, Sinbury, somewhere between London-wall and Bishopsgate.

The soot grew tired of the Cottage, however, and said that it gave him the blues. He christened it the "Distant Swamp." He was, perhaps, disappointed at finding no ghosts within the premises. After a few weeks he ceased to reside there, and, profiting by the occupation of the celebrated Albino Family from the Valley of Dapges. The Albino Patriarch, his wife, and their children, all with white hair, white skin, blue spun glass; all with pink eyes, violet gums, teeth of a pale mauve, and nas's milk complexion, lived here for a while, in a state of very gentle relsome, and from black eyes and contused nose, distributed among them by the Patriarch (who drinks), were frequently necessary for self-exhibition. After this they returned to the Valley of Dapges, where the youngest Albino girl, going alone on the top of a hay-waggon, tending goats, was fortunate enough, in an ecstatic vision, to behold a procession of Saint Teresa of Lima, who informed her that the Valley of Dapges was going to the devil through the deplorable delight which the inhabitants took in eating hard cider and reading the Siècle newspaper on the Sabbath-day. She forthwith became a miracle: the clergy took her to Rome; whereupon the Bishop absolutely condescended to issue a mandement about her, gently hinting that people who didn't believe in her miracles, generally and St. Teresa of Lima in particular, were babes of perdition, and candidates for perpetual brimstone; and the Albino Family left much better than when they were at Ranelagh, the pink-eyed Patriarch drinking more freely than ever.

After their departure, and the fire of incongruum, during which nobody to speak of save a mouldy man in a snuff-coloured coat, a Scotch cap, and a red woollen comforter, the ghosts of which he used as a pocket-handkerchief, who had his dinner generally provided for him by Grove, or some other viceroy of matter) sent him daily to a basin, drank cold coffee out of a black bottle labeled "eau gin," and read the correspondence a pamphlet containing a report of the murder of Lord William Russell by Benjamin Courvoisier, and was found dead in the hay-loft by the Sheriff of Surrey—after the transitory occupation of the Cottage by this personage, another family took up their abode here for a fortnight. Mr. M'Variety. These were the Ouli Zoog Zoog Arabs from Mecca. There was a grandfather, who was a shiek, and had a long white beard, but was one night recognized by a strayed Arab as having been a head shampooer at a bath in Cairo. The same tourist recognized the shiek's eldest son had frequently attended on him in the capacity of a pastry-cook in Alexandria; that the shiek himself, in the intervals of shampooing, was in the habit of relating improper stories, accompanied by gestures for the same; that the mother and her two daughters had belonged to the honorable fraternity of Almé; and that one particular hourí, with the biggest black eyes ever seen out of a sloe-bush, whose vocation it was to sit cross-legged in very baggy trousers on a divan, and smoke a hubble-bubble, was an Algerian Jewess, who had formerly kept a little shop for the sale of shawl squints, and attar of roses even more spurious, in Marseilles. Be it as it may, the Ouli Zoog Zoog Arabs from Mecca, during their stay, were instrumental in filling Mr. M'Variety's treasury. It was a great sight to see the sheik, with his very big green turban, and his very long white beard, strumming on a species of banjo—the Arab mandoline, I presume—while the Jewess smoked her narghile, and the daughters danced the shawl dance, kicking off their yellow slippers, and letting down their hair like hair in the most exciting passages, while the old woman, who had a pair of mustaches which would have done honor to a sergeant of the Old Guard, handed coffee round to the visitors at a shilling a cup; and when the sheik had been a donkey-boy, executed complicated sarabands and back somersaults, uttering, meanwhile, the cries of his native country. The family were entitled Mashammedans, and when they ate batchers' meat, which was seldom, a sheep was purchased for them, which they killed on the premises. You paid six-pence extra to see the sheik groveling on his prayer carpet; and the ladies never appeared in the promenade in the Gardens after the performance without being strictly veiled. It was, however, unfortunately discovered that the sheik was a Jew in his shampooing and banjo theory, and that the sheik was an Irishman, who had been discharged, not honorably, from the service of the Honorable East India Company. A newspaper exposure put an end to the performances of the Ouli Zoog Zoog Arabs. They essayed to work the provinces, first as Dancing Dervishes, and next as Maronite Christians fleeing from the persecutions of the Turkish Government; but were at last obliged to retire to Mecca, or Ireland, or obscurity.

And now the cottage was occupied by Madame Ernestine, as the direct heir and next of kin, in a professional line, of the Ouli Zoog Zoog Arabs, and a very clever light had wanted and thickered and gone out, like many other lights of the other days of Ranelagh. But Madame Ernestine was not in this moment, seemed to be in the ascendant, and Mr. M'Variety had paid homage to her importance by furnishing the Cottage in the most elegant articles which he had now vouchsafed to former occupants. He had fitted up the dressing-apartment as a smoking-room, and flattered himself that he had done the thing in first-rate style. It is true that the carpet did not cover the whole of the room; but it was a bright red one, of a large pattern, with a fringe all round, and was thus a little suggestive of a Turkish prayer-rug. The curtains of the windows were somewhat dingy and faded; but being lined with new pink calico, and tied up with yellow cords, with handsome tassels, of the patterns which we see in portraits of military heroes, taken with a back-ground of pillar and curtain, had a very effective, particularly from the outside, of dainty elegance combined with magnificence. Mr. M'Variety had aimed at splendor in another fashion, and, with this view, had introduced a great deal of lacquered brass and gilding into the apartment. There were heavy gilt cornices over the windows; and six-branch gilt, with an obstinate partiality for half-pint candles, and a tendency to drop or throw rickety inlaid tables, with brass rosettes on their hips, and brass claws at the extremities of their legs; a magnificent Venetian chandelier, designed on a scale adapted to halls of dazzling light, and consequently altogether out of proportion to its present place of abode, room or so of white and gold chairs, which had evidently, at one time or other, formed a portion of the costly furniture in the grand suite of a large marquis. All this would doubtless have been very magnificent had not the effect been slightly marred by traces of the Albino Family, and by the Ouli Zoog Zoogs on the walls and ceiling. Those traces consisted of stains and smears, from the dingy paper, as if the Patriarch had been in the habit of throwing his best-taps in the faces of the members of his family for not cleaning his mucky; and of hard dark smudges upon the ceiling, dimly suggesting that the Zoog Zoogs had used the apartment as a dormitory, and had been accustomed to go upon nocturnal hunting expeditions with a tallow-candle. It was suggested by a certain person that, in order to obliterate the dingy paper, as if the Patriarch had been in the habit of throwing his best-taps in the faces of the members of his family for not cleaning his mucky; and of perplexed and troubled him. He was troubled as he would have been if a performing horse of his, noted for kicking and throwing his rider, had suddenly shown a disposition to be docile and steady.

The manager led the way to the drawing-room, as if the customs followed briskly, singing a snatch of a gay reckless French song.

"What do you say, Countess, is this your style?" he said, as he threw up the door of the gilded apartment. The proprietor of ten thousand extra lamps had not miscalculated the effect of the gas-gilding and the tenue extrême and the ormolu chandelier. The countess was delighted.

"C'est magnifique, c'est charmant!" she said.

"Monsieur M'Varicy, you are the prince of managers—he assured that the disinterestedness of your regard for me has my highest consideration. You are a pattern to your profession, mon bon enfant, and I hope, when you die, you will be stuffed and put into a museum as an encouragement to managers. Ah! I see your honest face awake with gratification at the doing of a good deed; but, ma foi, I have known managers who, if they had caught themselves performing a virtuous action, would have said their prayers for once in their lives and asked to be forgiven. But you—vous êtes la perle des entrepreneurs."

"Thank you, countess. I'm very much obliged to you," said Mr. M'Varicy, with a knowing look; "I'm glad you appreciate what I have done for you; for you see I've got the Cottage up regardless of expense. Come and see the bedrooms. This one's for you; a snug crib, ain't it? light, comfortable, and airy, with elegance into the bargain."

"Charmante! charmante!" The countess was pleased, or feigned to be pleased, with every thing.

"And this little one," said Mr. M'Varicy, leading the way into the adjoining chamber, "is for missy."

"For missy!" said the countess. "Pourquoi? Encore! It is all in white! Is it meant for me? White is the emblem of purity, is it not? Why not for them, monsieur? Ha!" And she gave a most horrible grin of hers.

"Oh, well," said the manager, "if you like this one best you can have it. Please yourself, countess, but I thought you would prefer the large one."

"Monsieur Mac," said the countess, tapping the manager's arm with her right forefinger, "you did not think any thing of the kind. I am not a fool, Monsieur Mac; but no matter, the less said about this dainty story the better devil shall be rolled in snow. She shall be my guardian angel," and she leered at the manager knowingly as she spoke.

Mr. M'Varicy had seen a good many theatrical matters, guardians in the dark, but he knew how heartless, how ruthless, how rapacious they were; but he had never known one to equal this countess Frenchwoman. He was more glad to escape from her to the bustle of his managerial duties, in which he was accustomed to forget most of what in connection with the Countess which it was not pleasant to dwell upon and think about.

When he had gone the countess called for Lily. The girl entered the room timidly and doubtfully.

"Come forward, child," said the countess; "nearer, close to me. There. Listen. I am your mother. Do you hear that?"

Lily answered with a faint "Yes."

"Your father," continued the countess, "was a scoundrel, a beggar. He left me, your mother, beat me like a dog, degraded me, and at last left me to the mercy of the world. He died as he had lived, a beggar—and you he left me as a legacy. Do you know what that legacy was?"

The countess repeated the question fiercely, and Lily answered, hitherto, "No."

"Then I will tell you," said the countess. "You were that legacy. Do you understand? No? Then I will tell. I am your mother; you are my daughter. It is the duty of a daughter to obey her mother in all things. You shall obey me in all things. Do you hear?"

Lily stood before her mother, trembling and with downcast eyes, and answered, "I hear."

"MASSA CHARLES" AND THE SILVER DOLLAR.

One pleasant day in spring, not many years ago, a lady was sitting on the piazza of a house which belonged to a plantation on the beautiful Ashley River. A good-looking negro man, holding a pair of chickens, was walking up the noble avenue of oaks, and soon he stopped before the lady, making her a low bow.

"Missis," he said, "dese yer chicken an't gwine for stay young no longer. I would be knor of Missis feenuse go for sell 'em in de city?"

"I'll buy them, Jupiter," said the lady.

But that would not do. Jupiter wanted to get a present with the money for his sweet-heart, who had hinted to him that a head-handkerchief or turban, of all the colors of the rainbow, would suit her exactly: and he lo[illegible] disappointed that his kind mistress [illegible] "Well, Jupiter you may go, only be sure to come back by sunset."

With a joyful "Thank you, Missis," he rushed down to the landing-place, and soon had a light and pretty skiff out in the stream. As he was rowing he saw a gentleman beckoning him from the next plantation; and nearing the shore he said, politely, "Want me, Massa?"

"Yes; take me down to the city and I'll give you a quarter."

"Sartain, Massa, will pledjure," said Jupiter.

The gentleman got in, and began right away to talk; and Jupiter made himself very entertaining. Presently he said:

"Massa, don't you want for buy dem chicken? dey fine-rate."

"Well now, Jupiter," said "Massa Charles" (for it was he), "my wife says I must never do the marketing. If you told me a leg of mutton was a turnip I should believe you; but I will send you to Major Black, a friend of mine, who'll buy them if they are really good."

"Yes, sah, Massa," said Jupiter, and he rowed away like a good fellow.

"Sing us a song, Jupiter," said Massa Charles. "Come, I like to hear them. Mind, you must make it 'up-river.'"

"Oh, Massa! now you ben ax me to sing?" he answered, pretending to be very much put out, at the same time clearing his throat; then in a fine, clear voice he broke out in a longdrawn melody, keeping perfect time with the stroke of his oar:

"Oh Massa Dinah, she hab 'leben chilten,
Fol de rol de ri! chi! fol de rol de ri! hoe!
One he was a cripple, and 'nother he was a barber,
Fol de rol de ri! chi! fol de rol de ri!
Vid a stomach like a drum, he had, like a crow-bar,
Fol de rol de ri! chi! fol de rol de ri! hoe!
He free dat fiddle, and he free dat banjo,
Fol de rol de ri! chi! fol de rol de ri!
And his forehead massa stretched right up to Charleston,
Fol de rol de ri! chi! fol de rol de ri! hoe!
And he tree de landin' wid tank you berry much, Sar,
Fol de rol de ri! chi! fol de rol de ri! hoe!"

The last two lines were sung as the boat touched the dock; Jupiter bowing and grinning from ear to ear as Massa Charles gave him a present of not a dollar in his hand and walked away, first telling him where Major Black lived.

Then idle and ne'er-do-well, whom I could tell you a thousand stories, each one a thousand times better than the other, showing his kindness of heart, and how everybody loved him, Jupiter quad man strolled along King Street, with his hands in his pockets, humming to himself all he could recollect of "Oh! Massa Dinah," that Jupiter fostered to sell his chickens. He got a silver dollar for them, and, nearly with the delight of first buying the gorgeous cotton handkerchief which was to make Venus, his sweet-heart, more beautiful in his eyes than her charms could otherwise make her.

He walked along, looking into the windows, and presently came to a little haberdasher's shop in King Street, kept by a Jew and his family. They lived with their brother, who was so much disliked that he rejoiced in the nickname of "Turky-buzzard Hebrew," for he was a show-a-tremendous distort for any one in Charleston you have only to call him "a turkey-buzzard."

Jupiter stopped before the shop, puffing at his weed-y-fe-lock, pointed to a gorgeous handkerchief hanging over a string, and respectfully asked,

"How much you ax for dem, Missis?"

"It's a dollar," said the oldest Miss Shilkin, shaving about as much as the head of a pin.

"I ben take it, if you please, Missis," said Jupiter.

"I don't believe you've got a dollar," said the Miss old thing; "let's see that first."

"Why, Missis, what for you talk so? I got him dollar here," and he took out the silver dollar and put his pocket and held it lightly up between his finger and thumb.

The other sister had come out from behind the counter while he was speaking, and at the moment he held up the money she knocked below. It might have been accident; but any how the dollar flew out of Jupiter's hand and rolled under the counter in a flash.

"Oh, Missis," cried poor Jupiter, with a face of great distress, "lemme get 'hind de counter an' fine my dollar!"

"Your dollar!" said the wicked woman. "Be off with you! You never had a cent."

"Oh, Missis, I ax you please to talk so! I tes' 'em true for true. I got him for some chicken; and you know he ben under de counter."

"Get out of the shop this minute," cried both women, in a fury, just as Turkey-buzzard Skinflint sauntered in.

"What are you about, you rascal?" he said, facing round on the poor fellow.

"Oh, Massa, I clare it's my dollar! I tes' 'em in de store."

But the wicked women declared he was a thief, and some three or four people who had gathered in front to get at once and get Limpy Jonas, the lame constable, to take him to the guard-house.

At this very moment Massa Charles was walking that way, and seeing a crowd collected he pushed through to find out what it was all about.

To his great surprise he found the poor person he saw was his friend Jupiter, with the big tears rolling down his cheeks and his limbs trembling; and he heard the accusation against him, and found that the nigger had entered the store with a cockade-bill story about selling some chickens for a silver dollar, which he had dropped, and only came there to steal.

Massa Charles slid his sugar rising. He would have given five dollars to have shaken the wicked woman's snapping false teeth out of her mouth and thrown her up to the clouds in retaliation; himself, he beckoned to Jupiter and said, in a whisper,

"See here; take this dollar and run for your life."

He held out a silver dollar, and the poor soul with a look of deep gratitude the poor fellow put the money in his pocket, darted away at the top of his speed, and was round the corner just as old Turkey-buzzard Skinflint and Limpy Jonas, the constable, came in sight.

"Whar he now, Massa?" they all were! They abused Massa Charles as much as they dared; but that was not much, for he quietly said, "If you don't take care I'll have you up for robbery, for I'm pretty sure the negro told the exact truth;" and then he walked away with his hands in his pockets.

The next week Massa Charles was sitting at home with his little daughter Fanny on one knee and his little daughter Laura on the other, telling them for about the hundred and fiftieth time the wonderful story of "Jack and the Dragon." He had told just as long the story of "The Old Porter who had seven little Figs," because that had always to come first, if he expected any peace of mind. In the second story he had just got to the place where Jack was killing the dragon, who had nineteen heads, all of which must be cut off before he would consent to die, when Prince John, the waiter, came in and said,

"Massa, dere's a man at de door; he say he name Jupiter; want for see you jes one leetle minute."

"Jupiter?" repeated Massa Charles, thinking.

"Yes, massa. Ebery body want for any ting, come for plague you. I clare you ought'n to courage dese yer rascals; dey too 'pudent!"

"I want to go too," said Laura.

"Me too," said Fanny.

So Massa Charles went out laughing, with a little monkey skipping on either side; and there at the door was the poor black man whom he had saved out of the clutches of Turkey-buzzard Skinflint, his wicked sisters, and Limpy Jones the constable.

Scuse me, massa," said Jupiter, his black eyes shining with eager gratitude. "I don't mean no disrespec'. I ben bring for you; I tank you much, dear massa. I can't do noting 'cept gib you dis chicken. De berry nice one. Please take him, massa."

His voice broke and trembled. He held out a beautiful white cock by the legs, and his grateful gent face beamed with humble affection and respect.

"Why, Jupiter," said Massa Charles, "I only did for you what was just and right. It would have been wicked in me not to have defended you."

"God bless you, massa. When I tole some 'quaintances 'bout what you ben do for me dey say, 'I bet dat ar Massa Charles—he so berry, berry kind for everybody—he ben do it.' Dey ben right, massa."

I want little white chicken," said Laura.

"I too," said Fanny.

So Massa Charles, to his great delicacy of feeling as well as goodness of heart, thanked Jupiter and took the chicken he had brought. Bless you, little hearts! it would have mortified and grieved the black man terribly if it had been refused, or Massa Charles had declined to pay for it. He knew better than that, and thanked Jupiter just the same as if he had been a friend on equal terms; and the black man went home perfectly happy.

One or two good people did live in Charleston in those days. Ah me!

INTERESTING ITEMS.

THERE is a romantic story told of Farnsbury church, of a parish in which Bossets are very active, &c. There seems to be only the church; and as the inhabitants heard the sound of the bell every day, they thought when they heard it more than one, they became anxious to have some of their own. A subscription was therefore entered into, and Lord Bossett, who lived at the castle; and in due time the bells were hung, and on the day of the opening the head-parish was to bring the long-wished-for freight appeared in sight on the river, and was soon on its way to the village. Now, it was the custom for the parish, who had charge of the ship, bearing the bells, to have a feast on their arrival at the village; and the captain thought that he should be on shore that night. Think then of the Lord God Almighty's wrath, when he found, to his grief, "we should thank God every where." "Thou art a fool," said the captain in his mind and shortly took to his duty talked, the captain vexing his rope in oaths and the parish with the bells in their mouths, and on the vessel neared Willapoint Point and the dismal cliffs of the black Head, down began to roar; and while the many rager faces were watching, one of these frightful storms which are the bane of the Yorkshire coast—unmanageable, struck upon the rocks, and freight, men, captain, all were lost, except the parish, who were washed ashore upon a plank. In the pauses of the storm, which was long and violent, the cries of the dying were heard, and the bells still, they say, the buried belle give their mournful chime in the fierce and stormy winds of autumn.

A CURIOUS discovery has been made regarding the influence of iron on vegetables. On the chalky shores of Kent and Sussex, vegetation is poor; it is also known that vegetation has a new and blanched appearance. This is evidently connected with the absence of iron. A solution of the sulphate of iron. Harried beans watered with this solution assumed the additional weight of every fifth crest. Mushrooms, peaches, pears, vines, and wheat derive advantage from the use of manures containing iron.

An amusing episode occurred a few days ago at the dinner the Duke of Sussex is in the habit of giving after the Baden race to the gentlemen of the stewards who have attended them. The dinner takes place in the salon of the Russian Hotel. The guests on this occasion were the Duke de Mecklenburg, the Comte of Oldenburg-Saxe, the Prince Reuss (Prince Henry), the Prince de Hesse, the Count Montgelas, the minister of the ex-ducal steeple-chase at Baden, and the Duke of Sussex and his two sons. Seated sitting down to the table, the host noticed that there was a vacant place between the baron and the Duke of Sussex. The latter, to make room for the new comer, began to rub their necks leaning or at a steeple-chase, poured water over it, in proof of which his mystic name is Ondine. Ondine was put to the vote, and an overpowering majority compelled the Baron to undergo the ordeal of water-ward to avert the fearful danger to which he had so inadvertently exposed his friends.

The inhabitants of Chalons-sur-Saone, in France, were much astonished recently to see the sun, which was shining brightly suddenly obscured by a cloud of unusual size, shattered in the air and intercepted its rays. The inhabitants began to run about in great alarm, and the cry was had the towers of the cathedral were quickly covered. They proved to be a flock of storks, very rare in Europe, but frequently seen in hot countries. A change of weather was predicted from the appearance of these birds, and was quickly accomplished, for heavy rain fell shortly afterwards.

At the angle of the Rues des Marmousets and des Deux-Boules, which are both condemned to disappear, may be seen in the wall a sculptured stone, partially obliterated by time, but which still bears some traces of the former figure which it once represented. The history says that, in place of a porcelain dog fixed there during the reign of Charles IV., to receive the offerings of restless somnambulists, by one of those faithful animals. At No. 2 in that street there lived a certain Jean Pierre Lefebvre, a locksmith. A stranger having one day entered the shop of the former to be served, was struck with the fine locks. He finally left, drawn at his disappearance, had his conduct for, and a search was made in his room, which was found to be a repeater of the watch, searched all over Paris. As the workers were about to retire before leaving the house, Le Roi des Deux-Rentes the dog began to snout about him with an uneasy air. It next rushed into the butcher's shop, and commenced scratching on the floor with such persistence that it led to the discovery of a trap-door over a cellar, which still exists, and who is the body of the man was found not long gone. The history says the story, had made a bargain with his neighbors, whose plan, made of their windows, was to kill the stranger as he came out. Fortunately, the stranger came to get change for a piece of gold, and, a servant having gone for the police, he was arrested, where he was dispatched by the poor—took if not killed by the fall. The two partners were broken on the wheel, and their houses razed to the ground. Is there any truth in this story? What is certain is, that until the commencement of the nineteenth century there might have been seen an open space at a spot formerly occupied by the houses, the existence of which could still be seen. Francis I. it was who permitted the present locksmith to live.

The late Dean Buckland is said to have been so intimately acquainted with the properties of all the geological formations of England that, being one night belated, and not knowing where he was, he slipped from his horse, and, falling on a cold bank and tasted it. He immediately exclaimed, "Uxbridge!" and proceeded on his journey.

The death-watch (Anobium striatum) is a very common insects of our houses. Among those which are associated with the habits of insects there is a common superstition that the strange ticking sound often heard in old houses is a sign of approaching death. This noise, however, is produced by several beetles, which, during the breeding season, raise the neck and thorax (chest) together, by which means the head strikes against the wood. This, however, is a fact which, if more generally known, would save a world of needless anxiety and unrest. In the first place this noise insects do great injury to our furniture and the woodwork of our houses. Many more than a score species have captured this little beetle feigns death with the strangest of property, perfectly, as it said, to suffer death rather than to forfeit their claim to shrinking life. The death-watch is covered with a dull, yellowish, brown, size, and dark color, in very seldom seen; and, as there can be no reasonable doubt that these insects use in their boring operations, the sound seems to proceed itself from the mouth in opposite directions, thus adding to the pernicious terror wherewith by some persons it is regarded. The grub is very small, however, to be dreaded. It is during a paper which I hope will remove the obstacle in the way of many a sleepless night. "Is there life in the mine?" Thereupon he proposed for the hand of the Franciscan Lady, the only lady of his race, and was accepted. Miss Martial forthwith used the paper bridegroom for a footstool, but was afterwards married to a living husband.

"One day—so goes this popular tradition—as Sir Alexander Macdonald was strolling down the avenue from the Lodge of Hayston, mounted on his white pony, approaching, as if with the intention of passing him, Miss Martial. The usual greetings Murray asked Hayston if that was Miss Martial. 'Yes,' he said, 'it's just that, quite Martial. And I'll tell you my errand. I am going to court your sister Martial.' Hayston, who knew Macdonald for the reason that will afterward appear, was not willing that the highland chieftain go far with his errand. Some time gave the thing the go-by by saying that his daughter was very young for that. Then he was told that Miss Martial, whom, who was somewhat dotty, and who thereupon took the opportunity to leave off Blackhouse, himself in his visit would perhaps be more acceptable somewhere else. Macdonald would not take the hint, and insisted on his wishes being attended to. Hayston, at a moment's reflection, thought the advantage that was likely to arise to the establishment of her daughter, and to whom the disparity of years was no object, overbalanced the objections he had just made. 'Come with me immediately and call Hayston back again.' On this the latter was summoned, and turned out the county reason for his having declined Hayston's visits. 'Why, my dear,' he said, 'I thought you were dead.' 'Gang awa'

PLAN OF THE UNITED STATES IRON-CLAD, THE "CHICKASAW."

OFF MOBILE.

We give on this page several sketches relating to our naval fleet in Mobile harbor. One of these cuts represents the reception of the wounded on board the Metacomet, after passing the forts, August 5. The wounded were then transferred to the Pensacola Hospital. The adjoining illustration is a plan of the Chickasaw—a plan which is exactly repeated in the Winnebago. The Chickasaw is an iron-clad, mounting four guns. Its tonnage is 974 tons. It was built at Boston by AQUILA ADAMS in 1863. The Winnebago was built at St. Louis in the same year. The torpedo guards represented in the sketch are young trees cut down and stripped, with one end of each lashed aboard, and the other ends connected together by transverse pieces.

Another sketch represents the Metacomet's boats blowing up the rebel ram Nashville. This cut also gives a view of a portion of the obstructions in the harbor.

The lower cut is a view of Mobile city, with the rebel batteries guarding the approaches, and our fleet in the foreground.

REFUGEES AT CITY POINT.

As our military lines draw closer each day around the doomed cities of Richmond and Petersburg, the effect is seen not only in the number of deserters from the rebel army, but in the quantity of refugees that come into our lines, glad of any opportunity of escape from the horrible scenes of desolation hitherto surrounding them.

We give on page 701 a representation of the interior of the United States Sanitary Commission Boat at City Point, Virginia, at a time when a number of these refugees from Richmond are availing themselves of its hospitable shelter. In speaking of them our artist says: "The people here represented appear to belong to two distinct classes. One family seemed to be of what is known as the 'poor whites' in the South; the other family, if not exactly belonging to the 'Chivalry,' were evidently of a different and higher class. While they were staying on board, previous to their departure North, and during which time they received every attention and kindly consideration not only from the officials of the United States Sanitary Commission, but from all who came in contact with them, many opportunities were afforded for eliciting their opinions respecting the state of things between North and South.

"The only man among them—the head of the family, represented in the extreme back-ground—was apparently a simple-hearted, ignorant fellow, who was inclined to be very communicative, and who seemed never to have entertained any ill feeling toward our section — content if people would only allow him to cultivate his little patch of ground in peace and safety. The women throughout, however, and even the little children—doubtless well taught hitherto to look upon the Yankees as a set of ogahoos—were surrounded, seemingly at any rate, by an air of restraint and haughty dependence, as if they were as much hurt as pleased by the kindnesses showered upon them. When the man was asked by a by-stander what object he had in coming North, and if he would not have preferred staying South, one of the young women replied for him, in a rather pert manner: 'The only thing I came away for was them nasty guns you kept firing!' When asked again what notion they had of the Yankees before they saw them, the same young woman replied: 'We thought you was coming to kill us all and use us bad.' Some one said: 'How could you imagine such a thing?' to which she replied: 'How could we know any better? every body said so!'

"Not one in this family, confessedly, could read or write, except the man, who said he could read 'print' a little. The women and children had all very nice and regular features, and your artist must not think that the pipes I have put in the mouths of some of the former is a matter of fancy. All the women smoked, and common clay pipes were to be seen sticking out of lips far too pretty for such occupation.

"Whatever these people may have originally thought of the North and its inhabitants, it is evident that they are now becoming but too glad to exchange for a hideous life in the South the chance of pursuing their future career among us as independent free men and women, even though the inveterate prejudices of a life may still cling to them a little longer. Certainly such treatment as these outcasts received from the United States Sanitary Commission at City Point, and as they will doubtless receive every where else—could it only be known among their deluded people—would be enough to open the eyes of the most ignorant, and to touch the hearts of the most vindictive among them."

As an episode to the picture there is introduced in the fore-ground the figure of a wounded man, attended by Doctors M'DONALD and SWALM, of the United States Sanitary Commission—an extraneous and voluntary work which these gentlemen are not unfrequently called on to perform, in addition to their other multifarious and charitable duties.

SINCE GRANT'S last movement the number of desertions from the rebel army has greatly increased.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.

IN regard to the Paris Fashions for October we have just to observe that, for finishing up the fine season out of town, the dress bonnet is not at all de mode, especially if the lady be young. The new casquette (shown in our last month's engraving of the fashions) and the Windsor hat with feathers are the two varieties of fancy chapeaux most in vogue. For toilette de ville, however, the ordinary bonnet is necessary, and should be of the shape indicated in our fourth illustration. It may be of any color, but is usually of white muslin, ornamented with black beads or velvets, and rests closely to the head. In all probability, however, this shape, as well as the material, will undergo considerable modifications at the approach of the winter season.

The predominant color for dresses still continues to be white, or the lighter tints of the colors for which the summer of 1864 has been remarkable. For colored silks of darker hues, and especially for foulard dresses, straw ornaments have been applied with advantage; and these have the double merit of originality and cheapness, two qualities somewhat rare in this age of imitative ostentation, for the gratification of which the most extravagant sacrifices are so frequently made.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Evening Dress.—Robe of white alpaca, ornamented with black lace insertion, surrounded by bouquets of black velvet; the vest is similarly ornamented. Muslin chemisette, with collar and cuffs of embroidered muslin. The head-dress is composed of a wide entredeux, trimmed with narrow guipure over rose-colored silk, terminated by a rose-colored silk bow and ends.

Fig. 2. Dress for a Little Girl.—Low-necked muslin blouse, trimmed with black worsted braid; the rounded tunic on the edge of the skirt are bordered with black binding. White sleeves, with a band descending from the shoulder scarfwise, and attached at the waist.

Fig. 3. Dress for a Young Lady.—Checkered gray foulard robe, trimmed round the edge of the skirt with vandyke blue ribbon, surmounted by three narrow bands of blue silk. Muslin chemisette, pointed in front, plaited throughout the corsage, and ornamented with narrow strips of blue velvet. The bonnet, of the latest shape, is in tulle bouillonné, the crown being puffed by a garland of blue flowers hanging over a narrow white lace that partly covers the capote.

Fig. 4. Walking Dress.—Lilac foulard robe, trimmed, as shown in the illustration, with narrow colored silk edged with black guipure. Small upright collar, finished by a rose-colored gravat. Chapeau Windsor, ornamented with white feather in front, and another large feather falling over the hinder portion of the Tuscan hat.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER, 1864.

LITTLE STARLIGHT.

IT was soon after the first of those terrible Wilderness battles so fast spring that Little Starlight made his first appearance among us.

Now have you many idea who Little Starlight was? Very probably, from his romantic name, you picture him to yourself a six pretty boy—a bean-ideal Young America, with clustering curls, and the relevant blooming precocity of form and feature. Nothing of the kind. Our Lil de Starlight was a negro urchin extremely small for his age—which might have been fifteen could we have had a date to reckon from—and as black as the ace of spades, when the ace of spades is excessively black and shiny.

When he came, who he brought to, how he came among us, we never exactly knew. He was a sort of masculine Topsy, and probably mere "growed" somewhere in the vicinity of our hemisac. On the morning after the battle he had been found in our lines, strutting about the camp in a very nonchalant way, with a quick, cheery "Ha ha" for every thing he saw. His appearance was comical to the extreme. Upon his chest head, and entirely concealing his crisp wool, was jauntily placed a spoon-new artillery cap, which he had probably picked up from the field. He had fastened to the right shoulder of his ragged coat—a swallow-tailed blue of unknown antiquity—an immense epaulet, apparently plundered from the baggage of some retired officer; while a silken sash of flaring crimson was twined round his waist in a manner at once striking and effective, with a long end that trailed behind like the gaudy tail of some variegated tropic bird. His trousers—we will skip them; but it suffice to say that they were unmentionable in the last degree.

No one could tell how the little fellow got into the camp, and he wouldn't tell himself. The pickets and sentries swore prodigiously that he had not passed them. So we were compelled to let the story of his appearance remain unsolved.

It was shortly after sunrise when the corporal of the guard brought him before me, with

"Here's a prisoner, or contraband, or something of the kind, chaplain. I just picked him up, and don't know what to do with him."

I almost exploded with laughter at seeing the individual in question, but immediately set down on a stump and endeavored to look grave. Captain Allen came along at the same time, and presently the Major also dropped in. So we formed ourselves into an informal court-martial around the object of our attention, with the view of having some amusement for the hungry half hour that should elapse before breakfast. The "terms" of the bid was surprising; for he never changed countenance during the whole of this ceremony, which we, with a supposing as we could by word and look. All eyes were turned on me expectantly, so I opened the proceedings.

"What is your name, my boy?"

"Dun'no, mas'r. Spect I isn't got nom'n," was the reply, accompanied by a sparkling grin, of extraordinary breadth, as though his anonymous condition was a matter of much self-satisfaction.

"Oh, you've forgotten your name, I said. Why did they call you at home?"

"I allers came w'out callin'. But wen I shines at along kitchen fire, sometimes dey'd sing out, 'Sing! sometime 'Little Nig!' an den agin, 'Hyar, you G—d Nig!' I'll bet dey did! mean it." Then, with a self-conscious, I is!" he continued, swinging his arms gleefully about and shuffling his bare feet, as if contemplating a fandango.

"Silence!" roared the Major, who acted as presiding officer, at the same time knitting his brows fiercely to prevent the laughter which we felt choked him. "Silence, or I'll commit you for contempt!"

Somewhat startled by the vehemence of this injunction the little fellow remained silent, and, taking off his cap, commenced stroking his nut of a head in a serious manner, which was more comical than his mirth.

"Well, my friend," I resumed, "what do you do, when you come from?"

"No w'ar ob late, mass'r. Tas been sleepin' ebber since I was a-yer. Yer see I'se a-yer, I is. Yah! yah! I does."

"Silence!" exclaimed the judge.

"Certin, certin, mass'r! Yah! yah!"

"Who do you belong to?" I resumed.

"Yah! yah! I ain't got none. Yer see he's gwine away. Yah!"

"But what was your master's name?"

"Cunnel Billy."

"Billy what?"

"Dun'no! Yer see dis chicken were left behin' wid de mismus an' de gals, wile Mass'r Billy gwine to de war wid de Linkinses. An' yer see, de ole mismus she dun gib dis nig a lickin', so I jis slips out in de night time, climbs inter de boxes, crawls all de pigeons, an' clars de track for Ole Virginny. Yah! yah! I'se a awful cuss, I is!"

"Pigeons! What did you do with the pigeons?" I asked, my curiosity carrying me away from the subject in hand.

"Like ter 'em to be shore, mass'r! Dey'se bully feddler, nicer dan de hard tack. Yah! yah! I'se got jis one left."

And sure enough, as he spoke, he drew from one of the capacious pockets of his tattered coat a sorry looking pigeon, still alive, which, before we could guess his intention, he proceeded to pat and stroke in a very summary manner. Nipping the head of the bird between his finger and thumb, he twirled the body around in the air till it fell to the ground, completely twisted from the head, which remained in his hand.

"What are you doing that for?" I exclaimed, somewhat horrified at what I saw, as were the rest of the "Court."

The little fellow threw away the pigeon's head without answering, picked up the body, and held it stoutly forth with "I yah! yah! from which I judged that it was meant as a present for my breakfast.

"Well, what is the decision of the Court?" said I laughing, and turning to the Major.

"I really do not know," was the reply. "Ask the monkey if he will fight, and which side he favors."

I put the question.

"De Union all de time, sho'!" was the enthusiastic reply.

"What can you do?" I asked.

The little fellow cast a comprehensive glance around him in every direction, as if he could do any and every thing under the sun, and was merely puzzled upon which fact to fix for his first effort.

At length his eye caught sight of a kettle-drum which was taking an airing a short distance off, and with a roll of delight he ran toward it. Quick as thought the strap was over his shoulder, the sticks were in his hands, and throwing back his head with a gesture of pride, he rolled off the reveille with the flourish and accuracy of a master.

"Bravo!" cried Captain Allen. "You're the man we want. Why not have him drum for our company?" he added, turning to me. "Johnny went into the hospital day before yesterday, and we have had but little music since."

"An excellent idea!" said I.

The Major would have said Starlight, to his infinite satisfaction, was forthwith installed as second drummer-boy, Company C, —th New York Infantry.

His name—by which he was altogether known among us—originated, at the suggestion of one of the officers, in the wonderfully clear aspect of the heavens on the night preceding the early morning of his "capture."

He was a favorite in the company, and a standing joke with the regiment, in a single day. No one could come in contact with him, but he never complained of too much work. We made him wash himself thoroughly in the river, and then presented him with a genuine uniform, at which he appeared as proud as a young peacock of her sprouting tail.

Little Starlight was not one of us long, but if I should undertake to relate half of the many whimsical characteristics "the sun would go down on the unfinished tale."

He never was out of humor, was never excessively hungry, and his slender frame was of iron mould. He endured, without a murmur or any marks of fatigue, marches which tried the strength of the stalwart frames of hardened veterans, and would, after the march, execute with the band double-shuffles on Jim Crows, and Bob Ridleys for the diversion of the weary regiment. I never saw him flinch when under fire, and I have seen rather the reverse. He had a penchant for obtaining trophies on the field of battle; and carried so many knives and pistols upon his person that he was quite a walking arsenal. More than once he was seen to use his fire-arms, and if at long range, it was, nevertheless, with the best of precision.

It is true he had his foibles, and grave ones. He was a natural-born thief, and my most impressive admonitions usually failed to overcome my fear of the gravity of his fault. He seemed to consider himself naturally depraved, and was therefore philosophically resigned to his fate. I remember he was accused—with his usual "I'se a awful cuss, mass'r, I is"—of stealing a horse, for him when I thought of the criminal neglect which must have attended his bringing up a man that of the noble animal was of unfortunate race. Besides, the material effects of his thieving were not considerable. There was not much to steal in the army, when a man had only one old suit any thing worth retaining, a tight clutch upon Starlight's wristplate and a few preposterous threats usually caused him to "shell out" the missing article, if it was really in his possession. And it seemed generally conceded that his virtues more than counterbalanced his foibles. For his hand was as ready to support a wounded man to an ambulance as it was at rifling the pockets of a fallen foe.

There was one thing alone which almost redeemed him in the eyes of many, and that was his passionate love for freedom—his enthusiastic devotion to the cause under whose banner he served.

My darkey-chaplain was in no sad demand in those bloody battle-days, when ministrations to the dying and prayers for the dead were so frequently required; but I found more time, nevertheless, to devote to Starlight. The little heathen always listened with the profoundest gravity to every thing I said, but with a perpetual scrubbing of his short curly crown of me, except when I spoke of the future of his race, of their prospects for freedom and improvement. His eyes would light up at this, and his attentive features would fairly glow with enthusiasm.

"Yes, mass'r," he one day, exclaimed, "I 'clare! in my 'bolition heart, I'se ready to die, or 'nother. I knows I'll be free!"

"You are so already," said I. "The President's Proclamation has made you so. You have nothing to fear."

"Ja' so, mass'r," he replied. "De President he am a nice man, he am. But I doesn't feel it in de bone yit; I 'nebber will till I git on to Aix, you know. Jis' dere is freedom—only once!"

"On to whom?" I asked.

"On to de Ole Man—Cunnel Billy. Jis' lemme git on to him, an' I'll be free!"

"You surely would not kill your old master?"

"I wouldn't I! Yah! yah!" And thereat Starlight began to fumble among various knives and pistols which adorned his person in a manner that was any thing but conciliatory. "I'se die a chicken, he should preceive! I keeps on de look-out in dis way!" I used him lick my ole mudder till I bleed from de mouf an' nose, an' I'se ready, and you'll see de blood fly yourself. Yah! yah! I'se a awful cuss, I is."

Upon a briefer acquaintance with Starlight I should have smiled at the serio-comic manner in which these sentiments were enunciated; but, as it was, I shuddered at the intensity of passion which lurked in his tones.

And through all these terrible battles, and rapid marches and counter-marches, with which General Grant terrified and confused the rebel foe, from the Rapidan to the walls of Richmond, Little Starlight conducted himself with sterling credit, winning golden opinions from all, and, upon one occasion, a hearty hand-shake from the General of our division.

It was, however, at the severe skirmish on our left, immediately following our general repulse from the rebel works, and shortly before the transfer of our army to the south bank of the James, that the part which Starlight played in the great drama was to assume a truly tragic phase.

The enemy, themselves and ours were hotly engaged, and the fight fade fair to be bloody, if brief. I was immediately in the rear of a portion of our skirmish line which was severely hard with the wounded; and Starlight was hopping about me, doing what he could to assist, but now and then looking up, and directing curious glances toward the fight, which was not distant.

Suddenly an ambulance from him caused me to turn, when I saw him gazing intently, with his hand pointing toward the ground where the skirmish line was progressing.

"Hooray! hooray! Dere he is! dere he is!" he shouted.

He succeeded in directing my attention to a fine-looking rebel officer, who was cheering on his men in a charge they were making upon our position.

"Don't fire, mass'r!" cried Starlight, at the same time freeing himself from his drum and casting it on one side, while his voice was wild and strange with excitement.

And before I could arrest him, or exactly understand his intention, he snatched a musket and bayonet from the ground, and ran like a deer after our column, which was advancing to repel the threatened assault.

From my position I could see the whole affair. Th smoke of the musketry fire was thick, but a western gust cleared it away, and the opposing columns were pretty plainly discernible. Then the firing ceased, and I saw them meet in the shock of hand to hand fight. The clash of the steels was keen, and they scattered back toward their abatis and the thick woods on their right; but the officers retained their ground, endeavoring to inspirit their men by their own examples, and fighting bravely.

I saw Little Starlight rush headlong at the man to whom he had directed our attention, and I could hear his shrill cheer come floating to me on the wind. The combatants met, and for the size of an antagonist, yet they met with a shock which seemed equal on both sides. The officer evaded the bayonet of his gallant foe, and struck out sharply with his sword; and I saw the blood spring up high from the negro's neck. But the next instant they closed; the rushing line swept over the breast of the officer, and he rolled to the plain. Twice—thrice I saw the flashing bayonet leap into the air, and flash down again upon the prostrate man; and then, with a louder whoop than before, Starlight sprang on further into the fight; and the whole scene was shut from my view by the gathering smoke, for the breeze had died away.

In light we soon drove the rebels were driven far back into the woods, their abatis captured and held, and we in possession of the field. My interest in what followed was intense to intense that I immediately hastened to the ground.

Our loss had been inconsiderable, but that of the enemy was heavy, for they had suffered severely in all directions. I found the officer with whom I had seen Starlight engaged. He wore the insignia of a rebel captain, and was wounded, with his sword pierced many times by bayonet thrusts. As I was standing beside the body, Sergeant K—— of Company —— came up with a terribly crushed look.

"Little Starlight is dying, Sir," was his greeting, "and he wishes to see you very much."

Starlight dying! I comprehended it figurated, at the same time hurrying to the point indicated.

It was true enough.

Little Starlight lay at the edge of the enemy's works, with a frightful gun-shot wound in the back part of his head, and a bayonet thrust beneath his left. Tears were clustering around him with sympathizing looks and tearful eyes. You may not believe me, but nevertheless it is the truth when I say that the brave boy grinned joyously when he saw me.

"Yah! yah! Mass'r Chaplain," he cried, as I took by his side, "I took his hand, "I dis nig's done for, he is. But did yer see me in de fight, mass'r? Did I'se see me tackle dat ole coon, Cunnel Billy? Did I'se get it at last, mass'r? I'se a awful cuss; but I'se got it at last!"

"Got what, my poor boy?" I whispered, with a trembling voice.

"Freedom!" cried Starlight, springing to his feet.

I saw that wild, strange gleam of passion leap into his rude features, and then he fell back into my arms.

"It am a lubly day, mass'r," he continued, speaking with great difficulty. "It am shining day, an' de sky pellucid, mass'r. But I hears de big drum ob de sky rollin' de rebellie ob de Lord. De day am breakin' for dis chile, mass'r; for I'se got at last!"

His voice failed him here. He moved his lips; but in a moment they were stilled forever. He was dead.

I laid him down gently on the grass.

The Major had also been standing by.

"Come," said he, taking me by the arm—"come, let us go."

And so we went away I saw his mustache tremble perceptibly.

There were three regular members of Company —, who died that day in that skirmish, but I believe not one of them was mourned with a deeper, sincerer sorrow than was Little Starlight. One of the sergeants, who was a rude rhymster in his way, composed a brief epitaph for him. Others of the company performed what little offices they could, and the Colonel inquired particularly into the circumstances of his death. The Union chain were buried separately—they were so few. Starlight was had a little grave all to his own. He was free at last, and he thus came into the ownership of about five feet of the earth which had not been a very affectionate mother to him.

I said that he had an epitaph. It was scrawled upon the rude head-board by the author; and, as there is something epigrammatic about it, it may not be out of place to conclude our story with.

HERE LIETH LITTLE STARLIGHT,
WHOSE ILL-STARRED SPIRIT WON ITS RIGHT TO SCORNED FREEDOM THROUGH

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

The Secretary of the Treasury gives notice that subscriptions will be received for Coupon Treasury Notes, payable three years from Aug. 15th, 1864, with compound interest at the rate of seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum—principal and interest both to be paid in lawful money.

The Notes will be convertible at the option of the holder at maturity, into six per cent. gold-bearing bonds, payable not less than five nor more than twenty years from their date, as the Government may elect. They will be issued in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1000, and $5000, and all subscriptions must be for fifty Stars or some multiple of fifty dollars.

As the Notes draw interest from August 15, persons making subscriptions are expected to add the interest accrued from date of note to date of deposit.

SUBSCRIPTIONS will be received by the Treasurer of the United States, at Washington, the several Assistant Treasurers and designated Depositaries, and by all National Banks which are depositaries of public money, and

ALL INCORPORATED BANKS AND BANKERS throughout the country will give further information and AFFORD EVERY FACILITY TO SUBSCRIBERS.

PLAYING CARDS.

The American Card Company's New Union Playing Cards, National Emblems.

They are the cheapest, the most handy, and suit the popular idea. The suits are Liberty, Shield, Stars, and Flags. Counters in the place of the customary Markers of Liberty and Made for Jack.

All the games can be played as readily as with cards bearing foreign emblems. Each pack is put up in an elegant end-open box, and may be stored away for any time.

In order that all dealers may have an opportunity to sell these cards, a sample box of twelve packs will be sent, post-paid, on receipt of Five Dollars. Address

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

PINEAPPLE CIDER.

IS A PREVENTIVE OF SICKNESS.—The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that in no time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all bowel, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. A common quart bottle will last a person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; prevention is still very essential than being sick. It is not better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick than to pay one or twenty dollars in doctors' bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the strength of your vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who was afflicted with a kind of the Pineapple Cider, secures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month, at the first trial. He continues the use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire curative to sickness to his cure. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $1 per bottle (or quart). Sent free by express on receipt of price.

All orders should be addressed to

Brandreth's Pills

Mildly but certainly relieve the bowels of all contrary to health; a single dose has often been the means of saving a valuable life. By using this medicine when sick you assist nature to throw from the system those matters upon which disease depends for continuance.

Influenza is soon cured by Brandreth's Pills. When the bodies are full of corrupt matters, they should be used so as to produce full effects. When the fever is better, one smaller dose. The worst attacks are often cured in forty-eight hours.

See B. Brandreth on the Government Stamp.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, with full directions. Purchase none unless the PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

American Watches.

The high premium on gold, and the increased rate of duty on watches, have greatly enhanced the cost of those of foreign manufacture, and it is now impossible to purchase a good watch, of English or Swiss make, except at a very extravagant price. For the same cause, the cheapest qualities of foreign make, the worthless snares and Lepines which flood the country, have nearly risen to the price at which the American Watch Company furnish their well-known "Wm. Ellery" watch—a watch of the most substantial manufacture, and an accurate and durable time-keeper.

Our light-jointed watches are relatively still cheaper. We have advanced the prices of our finer movements but about 25 per cent. since the war began, while foreign watches of the same grade cost three times their ante-war prices.

PHIL SHERIDAN'S RIDE TO THE FRONT, OCTOBER 19, 1864.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

OH, WANTON WIND!

BY MILES O'REILLY.

Oh, wanton wind! warn, kissing, kind,
Thy zephyrs turned my Laura's tresses;
Bathed lip and hand with fragrance bland,
And even fanned those deep recesses
Where love is seen, warm-couched, serene,
Asleep between two summer billows;
Oh, heedless wind! to beauty blind,
Where could thou find more tempting pillows?

The lily bell, whose anthers tell
The time so well, by you set ringing;
The rival rose, wherein repose
Queen Mab, and those only her clinging,
The violet sweet, the dusky neat—
Should I repeat each fragrant blossom—
Oh, careless wind! could all combined
So please thy mind as Laura's bosom?

Intensate still! hence, hence and fill
The idle sail of you bright vessel!
And yet—ah, stay! ere hence you stray
Leave me, I pray, your right to nestle;
Give me to seek her damask cheek,
And whisper there what then ne'er dreamest!
For me to lie one moment nigh
Her heart and die, were bliss supremest!

PHIL SHERIDAN RIDING TO THE FRONT.

We give on our first page a sketch of General SHERIDAN's arrival on the field October 19. The victory gained at Cedar Creek that day surpassed in interest the victory gained precisely one month earlier at Winchester. It was a victory following, upon the heels of apparent reverse, and therefore reflecting peculiar glory upon the brave commander to whose timely arrival upon the field the final success of the day must be attributed.

The General was at Winchester in the early morning when he enemy attacked—fifteen miles distant from the field of operations. General WRIGHT was in command. The enemy had approached under cover of a heavy fog, and flanking the extreme right of the Federal line, held by CROOK's Corps, and attacking in the centre, had thrown the entire line into confusion, and driven it several miles. The stragglers in the rear were fearfully numerous, and the enemy was pushing on, turning against the Federals a score of guns already captured from them.

This was the situation a little before noon when SHERIDAN came on the field, riding, says one of his staff, so like Black Bess himself could not have kept up. A staff-officer meeting him pronounced the situation at this stage to be "awful."

"Pshaw," said SHERIDAN, "it's nothing of the sort. It's all right, or we'll fix it right!"

SHERIDAN'S order to his Corps was simply to the extreme left. "Galloping past the batteries," says the World correspondent, "to the extreme left of the line held by the cavalry, he took the front, took off his hat and waved it, while a cheer went up from the ranks not less hearty and enthusiastic than that which greeted him after the battle of Winchester. Generals rode out to meet him, officers waved their swords, men threw up their hats in an extremity of glee. General SHERIDAN, discovering SHERIDAN at the moment he arrived, rode up to him, threw his arms around his neck, and kissed him on the cheek. Waiting for no other parley than simply to exchange greeting, and to say, 'This retreat must be stopped!' Sheridan rode down and began galloping down the lines, along the whole front of the army. Every where the enthusiasm caused by his appearance was the same."

The line was speedily re-formed; provost-marshals brought in stragglers by the scores; the retreating army turned its face to the foe. An attack just about to be made was repulsed, and the tide of battle turned. Then SHERIDAN's time was come. A cavalry force was ordered against the right and left flank of the enemy, and then a grand advance of the three infantry corps from the right on the enemy's centre. "Through Middletown," says the correspondent above quoted, "and beyond, the enemy fled, and the Army of the Shenandoah pursued. The roar of musketry now had a gleeful, dancing sound. The guns fired slotted salutes of victory. Meredith, charging in on the right and left, doubled up the flanks of the foe, taking prisoners, slashing, killing, driving as they went. The whole of the infantry was now unmistakably more terrible. The lines of the foe swayed and broke before it every where. Beyond Middletown, on the battle-field over in the morning their own columns were completely overthrown and disorganized. They fled along the pike and over the fields like sheep."

Thus on through Strasburg with two brigades of cavalry at full speed. Two thousand prisoners were gathered together, though there was not sufficient guard to send them all to the rear. The guns lost in the morning were recaptured, and in many more taken, making fifty in all, and, according to SHERIDAN's report, the enemy reached Mount Jackson without an organized regiment.

The scene at SHERIDAN's head-quarters at night after the battle was wildly exciting. "General CUSTER rushed about 9 o'clock. The first thing he did was to hug General SHERIDAN with all his might; hollow like a wild boy, whirling him around and around, with the shout, 'By —, we've driven them out and got the guns!' Catching sight of General TORBERT, CUSTER went through the same proceeding with him, until TORBERT was forced to cry out: 'There, there, old fellow; don't capture me!'"

In the battle-cry in the front, October 19, 1864, will go down in history as one of the most important and exciting events which have ever given interest to a battle-scene; and to this event will be attributed the victory of the day. Says General GRANT: "Turning what bid fair to be a disaster into a glorious victory stamps SHERIDAN what I have always thought him, one of the ablest of Generals."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1864.

THE JACKSONIAN DEMOCRACY.

THE call for a meeting of old Democrats who believe that we should first exhaust the rebel armies before we attempt "to exhaust all the resources of statesmanship," is one of the most remarkable signs of the times. It proceeds from old-fashioned Jacksonian Democrats, who have known no other party name or association. They voted for MR. LINCOLN in 1860, but who see that they must vote for him in 1864, or connive at national dishonor. It comes from men who can not recognize the Chicago platform as worthy of American patriotism, and the candidates who stand upon it as representatives of the American Union. A Major-General who accepts, without question, the Democratic nomination of a Convention whose whole movement proceeds upon the plain declaration that the war is a failure, becomes—as one of his chief supporters calls him—the "creature" of that movement, and such a Major-General can by no possibility be the candidate of men whose chief delight is to remember "the days of JACKSON," and to call themselves by his name.

The call is signed by some of the most eminent and influential Democrats in the City and State of New York and in all the loyal States. They feel that the men who are now controlling the party do not represent its true instincts, and that the policy to which it has been long devoted, the name Democratic is so cowardly and dishonorable that, in scornfully rejecting it, there is great danger that the people will not even recognize it with the party name it bears. This call substantially asks what future there can be for a party which is led by VALLANDIGHAM, the SEYMOURS, LONG, PENDLETON, WOODS, and HARRIS. It further asks what sort of Jacksonian Democracy is that of which REVERDY JOHNSON, ROBERT J. WALKER, WASHINGTON HUNT, and HIRAM KETCHUM are doctors and expounders. It further asks what kind of a Democratic party it is which CALEB CUSHING, DIX, F. B. CUTTING, MOSES TAYLOR, ALEX. T. STEWART, GUSTAVUS A. CONOVER, HENRY NICHOLL, WILLIAM H. WEBB, PETER COOPER, A. VANDERBILT, AUGUSTUS SCHELL, THEODORE ROOSEVELT, EDWARDS PIERREPONT, HENRY G. STEBBINS, JAMES R. WHITING, GEORGE B. BUTLER, D. S. CONOVER, and HENRY REVERDY, JAMES WADSWORTH, A. A. VALENTINE, HENRY T. INGALLS, and J. A. STEWART. If these men are not Democrats, who are?

But higher than any partisan consideration is the patriotism of this call. These are men who have always served their country as Democrats. They love their country still. But they love their country more. And, therefore, they oppose a policy which is, although falsely, called by the party name. It is because the abstraction of the truth that the Chicago infamy is fully understood by the people; and that no letters, however painfully labored to obscure the position of the candidate, can possibly conceal it. M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON are the candidates of compromise with rebellion, of submission, and surrender. What was that Democratic policy? When was cowardice an American policy? If ANDREW JACKSON had said to the South Carolina nullifiers as GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN says to the rebels, "Lay down your arms, into an ultimate convention," or had tweetly sighed with GEORGE H. PENDLETON, "Let them depart in peace," no loyal Democrat and unconditional American patriots would ever have called themselves the Jacksonian Democracy.

If DOUGLAS had lived, instead of whining, "It's a very expensive war," we're dreadfully whipped, and Slavery is so very divine: let's ask them for peace," he would have cried, with his Union men of '60—"Fight for your emancipation and more uncompromising war;" and, like LINCOLN, would have carried the country.

SHERIDAN.

GENERAL PHILIP SHERIDAN differs from the Chicago Convention. That convention body, led by HORATIO SEYMOUR, pronounced the war a failure. "Do you think so?" cries SHERIDAN, as he and his brave men turn the tide of battle and win another glorious victory. It is a victory won over the army of EARLY reinforced from Richmond. It is a victory under which Lee must wince and rue, for if he can not hold the Valley he can not hold Richmond. It is a victory which infinitely increases the spirit of SHERIDAN'S army, and correspondingly weakens that of the enemy. It is a victory which illustrates his military genius, for few generals have ever done what SHERIDAN did. It was not only a battle fought and fought retrieved. The exulting enemy was routed, and lost his trains and guns. Such victories are won only by a general who entirely trusts his army: and by an army which knows and loves its general, and would gladly follow him wherever he led.

Thus the national campaign of 1864 draws to a close more magnificently than any previous one, while the whole military movement of the rebellion shows the spasmodic fury of desperation. HOOD's march to SHERMAN's rear, PRICE's marauding invasion of Missouri, the raid upon St. Albans in Vermont, the guerilla gusts that dash into our lines and are gone, the serious debate in the rebel papers upon the arming of slaves, and the loss and rout with which every rebel plunge is baffled—all these things betray the fierce and fruitless energy of despair.

And this sudden activity along the rebel lines is in concert with the Chicago movement. It is meant to rex and harass the public mind with doubts and fears, to appall the timid, and weaken the feeble. If the rebels can gain an advantage, however slight, at any point, they know, with the Chicago platform, that they increase the chances of the election of PENDLETON and M'CLELLAN. That alone shows that the Chicago candidates represent the policy of submission and surrender. But the people of the United States elect General M'CLELLAN for their President and they declare that the war is a failure, and that the rebels have no hope but in the best terms the rebels may choose to allow. They own that they are conquered, and they deliberately decide to confide to General GEO. B. FITZ-JOHN PORTER, who, from the days of West Point, has held a singular ascendency over General M'CLELLAN, to substitute DON CARLOS BUELL for SHERMAN; and some General PATTERSON for PHILIP SHERIDAN.

With Generals of the BUELL school in the field, with PENDLETON, HORATIO SEYMOUR, WICKLIFFE, COX, LONG, and Company, in the Cabinet, the overthrow of the essential principle of the American Government is assured. For the policy to support a compromise with rebellion, and that is the confession that the authority of the Government can not be maintained. If the GRANT, SHERMAN, SHERIDAN, and FARRAGUT are clearly seen by the American people, those people can not mistake the issue, and will not vote for their own disgrace.

AGREEABLE TO REBELS.

A GREAT deal of Copperhead appeal is to this point—that MR. LINCOLN is a very distasteful man to the rebels, and they will never submit so long as he is President; but General M'CLELLAN is more agreeable to them, and they will be much more disposed to come to him.

There are two things to be considered in this astute argument. The first is, that if citizens refusing to yield to the result of a Constitutional election because of their personal dislike of the candidate elected, are to be bribed into quiet by having that man set aside, they accomplish their rebellion and overthrow the Government. And they overthrow it upon a pretense so utterly puerile as to be absurd. In the present case the objection of the rebels to MR. LINCOLN is that he is identified with the supremacy of the Government, which is the very reason why we ought not to displace him before the insurgents submit. They would be made to yield to the authority of the Government in the person of the man under whose administration they defied it. For there would be no confusion in their minds. In the rebel view MR. LINCOLN is identical with the Government, and yielding while he is its representative they will understand that they are beaten. If they have only a choice of persons, and we comply, they will feel, as they ought, that it is not they, but the people, who have yielded. The second point of MR. LINCOLN upon such a ground as this is to show at once that your sympathy is with the rebels.

The second point is, that if General M'CLELLAN is more agreeable to the rebels than MR. LINCOLN, it is not an honorable fact for the General. For they can prefer him only because they believe that he has infinitely devoted to the Union and Government; or because they believe that they can coerce him to their will; or because they are grateful for his unwillingness to hurt them. These are reasons for the rebels to pray for his success: but they are not reasons for loyal citizens to vote for him.

MR. PENDLETON'S "OLD FAITH."

MR. GEORGE H. PENDLETON, the Chicago candidate for Vice-President, has written a letter, in which he says that "there is no one who cherishes a greater regard for the Union, who has a higher sense of its inestimable benefits, who would more willingly labor for its restoration by all means which will effect that end, than myself." He says also that he makes no profession of a new faith, that he only repeats that of an old one.

This letter, like General M'CLELLAN'S, is intended to mislead the public mind. Nobody ever charged that MR. PENDLETON was opposed to the Union. But he himself frankly tells us that if any State chooses to secede, the United States Government has no right and no power to prevent it. This is his "old faith," which this letter assures us that he has not changed.

MR. PENDLETON'S speeches and votes in Congress since the rebellion began, from his elaborate effort in the session of 1860-61, in which he denied that the relevant CALHOUN doctrine of State sovereignty, and insists that the National Government has no authority to enforce its laws or maintain its existence—from the time when he said of the States, "If your differences are so great that you can not or will not reconcile them, then, gentlemen, let the seceding States depart in peace," down to the moment when "he thanked God that he had not voted a man or a dollar for this abolition war," have been frank and consistent, and this letter shows it.

The New York Daily News, the leading peace organ in the country, says, with perfect truth:

"MR. PENDLETON'S letter can take its place upon his record in perfect accord with his antecedents as a consistent and able opponent of the Peace Democracy. . . . MR. PENDLETON has never been evasive or equivocal in his expressions of opinion. His political past has been of too sincere and emphatic a nature to permit of misconstruction. Whether when he reaffirms his regard for the Union of our fathers, when he expresses his belief that 'the Union is the guarantee of peace, the power, the prosperity of the people,' when he appreciates that he is but uttering the sentiments of peace men generally; for we know well enough that he alludes to no constrained Union, to political compacts only enforced at the bayonet's point, no system of government upheld by armies and navies, but a Union based upon the unanimous consent of the several sovereignty of the States, and dependent on the consent of the people."

MR. PENDLETON does not praise the Union half as earnestly as JEFFERSON DAVIS used to, and, like JEFFERSON DAVIS, he is very careful to avoid saying that he thinks it can be restored by force of arms. "By all means which will effect that end," says MR. PENDLETON; but as he thanks God that he has never favored the war, it is clear that war is not one of the means. But "an immediate cessation of hostilities" is a means; compromise is a means; negotiation is a means. And if all such means fail, then—"let the seceding States depart in peace." This is MR. GEORGE H. PENDLETON'S "old faith;" and when it is the new faith of the American people to end forever what M'CLELLAN would be President and Vice-President—but not before.

THE TENNESSEE TEST OATH.

IN his Augusta speech JEFFERSON DAVIS says: "We must beat SHERMAN; we must march into Tennessee—there we will draw from twenty thousand to thirty thousand to our standard."

It is to prevent these very persons from voting that the "Tennessee test oath" is proposed. The loyal citizens of that State intend that the rebels shall not regain at the polls what they lose in the field, and will not obtain possession of the State either by arts or arms. Does any truly faithful citizen of this country object to any stringency of oath which secures that result, and defeats DAVIS's purpose?

COLONEL LOWELL.

AMONG the killed at the late great battle and victory in the Shenandoah Valley was Colonel CHARLES R. LOWELL, JUN., of the Second Massachusetts Cavalry, commanding one of MARSHALL'S brigades. He was in the service at the beginning of the war, he was commissioned Lieutenant in the Sixth regular cavalry, and soon rose to be Captain. During the Peninsula Campaign he served upon the staff of General M'CLELLAN, and his great military skill and commanding character for endurance and nerve to appoint him Colonel of Volunteers. When his regiment was ready for the field COLONEL LOWELL was intrusted with the cavalry in the District of Columbia to watch Maryland in front of Washington. From this duty he welcomed the summons to the Valley at the opening of SHERIDAN'S campaign, during which, in his daring and victorious assaults, for which his name was mentioned with constant honor, no less than twelve horses were shot under him.

At the battle of Cedar Creek, at about eleven o'clock in the morning, Colonel LOWELL was struck by a spent ball in the breast. Removed from the field by order of the surgeon's request of Generals TORBERT and MERRITT that he would allow himself to be carried to the rear, he remained lying upon the field awaiting the order to charge. At three o'clock in the afternoon the order came. He caused himself to be lifted into the saddle, and although his voice was gone, so that he could whisper merely, he placed himself at the head of his column to which every whisper of their beloved leader was an inspiration. In the action in the little town Colonel LOWELL was shot in the back, probably from an ambush, and his frame was instantly penetrated. But he died as he perfectly clear, and he at once prepared to die. Nothing was forgotten in those last hours by the tenderest husband, the most faithful friend, the truest friend. Every final disposition was calmly made, and he asked to be buried upon the field where he had fallen—a request which was rewarded, and he rests in the silent pain, gradually sinking, he lingered through the night and died the next morning, as only good men and brave men die. He was thirty-two years.

Gentle, brave, and generous; of a rarely blended manliness and tenderness; carefully educated at Harvard College, and thoroughly trained to practical affairs by wide travel and much experience of men; of a singular purity and nobility of nature, and entirely devoted to the cause for which he died, COLONEL LOWELL has also only brother, Lieutenant JAMES LOWELL, killed upon the Peninsula, and his brother-in-law, Colonel ROBERT G. SHAW, killed at Fort Wagner, in the flower of his youth and domestic happiness, another of the costly sacrifices that this nation offers for its salvation.

And so long as the grass grows green upon the graves of these dear and heroic youths, the hearts that loved and honored them are pledged more surely than ever to the overthrow of the system which instigated this rebellion to destroy the country, and murders our friends and brothers who uphold it. They die, these brave and noble boys, but they live. They live in our purer purpose, in our firmer resolution, in the surer justice of the nation. Against every promise, against every concession, against surrender, this precious blood cries from the ground. "God be thanked! no nation could be saved to which it cried in vain.

CHEERFUL FOR THE "ULTIMATE CONVENTION."

"My first effort was for peace," said JEFFERSON DAVIS at Augusta, "and I sent commissioners to endeavor to arrange an amicable dissolution. From that time to time I have repeated efforts to that end, but never, never have I sought it as any other basis than independence."

It is asserted," says the Montreal correspondence of the London Times, "that the Hon. C. C. CLAY and the Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, the Confederate Commissioners in Canada, have received instructions from Richmond to propose peace.....on the basis of a restoration of the Union. I am able to state on the highest authority that MESSRS. CLAY and THOMPSON have no such instructions. They adhere to Southern Independence, and that alone."

Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS says the same in his letter.

Governor BROWN repeats the same statement.

HERSCHEL V. JOHNSON must have independence at least.

"If you can not or will not conclude your differences," says Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON, "then, gentlemen, let the seceding States depart in peace."

"Mr. PENDLETON'S actions and records are the same as the recorded position of GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN," says Mr. SANDFORD E. CHURCH.

MR. PENDLETON AND THE REBELLION.

A few evenings ago Mr. JOHN VAN BUREN introduced to a serenading multitude in front of the New York hotel, the favorite resort of secessionists in the city, his "darling sister" Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON. Mr. PENDLETON said that he was born in Ohio, and knew the sentiment of her people. But we all knew what that is. Ohio told us on the 11th of October. Mr. VALLANDIGHAM is also from Ohio—and he knows her sentiments. He learned them last year.

Mr. PENDLETON also alluded to a campaign document representing him as giving a vote in Congress on the 4th of July, 1864, when Congress adjourned on the 4th of July; and from this "fraud and forgery," he says, you may judge of the credibility of the whole publication.

But the student of Mr. PENDLETON'S record will find that, on the 7*th of January*, 1864, for which evidently July is a misprint, Mr. JOHN D. BALDWIN offered a resolution that a peremptle utterly denouncing the rebellion as "organized treason," etc. All who voted voted aye. Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON dodged.

On the 18th of January, 1864, Mr. Smith of Kentucky submitted the following preamble and resolution:

"Whereas, A most desperate, wicked and bloody rebellion exists within the jurisdiction of the United States, and the safety and security of personal and national liberty require that it be suppressed and order established; therefore,

"Resolved, That it is the political, civil, moral, and sacred duty of the people to meet it, fight it, crush it, and forever destroy it."

Mr. JAMES C. ALLEN moved to lay the preamble and resolution on the table. This failed, but Mr. PENDLETON voted for it—yeas 26, nays 102.

The resolution was then adopted—yeas 112, nays 16—Mr. Pendleton voting against it, with WOOD, VALLANDIGHAM, JAMES C. ALLEN, HARRIS of Maryland, ANCONA, and others.

On the 18th of January, 1861, at the beginning of the rebellion, Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON submitted a series of resolutions to President to recognize secession in these words

"That may be the constitutional power of this Government to recognize the secession of a State I decline to discuss at present. But this I say, if we should become engaged in war with a foreign enemy, and a portion of our territory should be captured and refused to possession by the enemy, and we should be obliged to make a treaty of peace on the basis of excluding what had justly been acquired—all possible—acknowledging the sovereignty of that territory to have passed away from us, entitling the Federal Government would have the power to confirm to our restricted limits, and to enforce its jurisdiction to our admitted boundaries." It was to dismemberment, as my colleague declares, but not the Federal Government so much power to treat that question now or at the end of a war! Will a conflict of arms confer constitutional power upon the Federal Government? If those Southern States can not be conciliated, and, by you, gentlemen, can not find it in your hearts to grant to their fellow-citizens what must leave the family matters, I would signalize their departure by tokens of love."

On the 16th of September, 1864, Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON was in Dayton on a visit to his friend Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, and he made a brisk speech, in which he speaks of the Democratic party—meaning the Chicago Convention—"whose beneficent principles secured universal suffrage in National Convention will bring us peace." Those beneficent principles are, that the war has failed; that we must ask for an immediate armistice; and go into "an ultimate Convention."

This will perhaps serve to show the "fraud and forgery" of the statement that Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON is of the ultra Southern States-rights school, as it certainly reveals the exact quality of his "devotion to the Union and the Constitution."

DAVIS AT AUGUSTA.

Upon his return from Macon JEFFERSON DAVIS made a speech at Augusta. It has the same wild tone of despair as that at Macon. "Work," he says, "will not conquer peace. You must consult your heart: perform more than the law can exact; yield so much as freemen can grant, and all will be well." In his foolish fury JEFFERSON DAVIS calls his loyal fellow-citizens of the United States "deniers of the rights of men," while he and the world know that the only right for which they fight is that upon the Government of his country was that it was secured in the future to Liberty and equal rights. He and his rebels refused to have slavery. They now declare it was for independence, and because of incompatibility. But the independence they seek is for the purpose of perpetuating slavery, and the incompatibility they plead is because of the existence of slavery.

"We were a free and independent people, in States that a right to govern their own Government when they saw fit," says DAVIS; and his Lieutenant, STEPHENS, declares that they declared "that every Government to rest upon the "corner-stone of slavery."

THE SAME RECORD.

In a late speech for the Chicago candidates in the city of New York Mr. SANFORD E. CHURCH said that "he could not see why any one should object to Mr. PENDLETON'S record. The actions and his records were the same as the records and position of GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN."

If this be true, Mr. M'CLELLAN is of the political school of JOHN C. CALHOUN and JEFFERSON DAVIS, as Mr. PENDLETON is.

He then supports the extreme doctrine of State sovereignty. So, as Mr. PENDLETON does.

He thinks that the States have the right to secede at pleasure, as Mr. PENDLETON does.

He believes that the Government has no right to defend itself from the attacks of rebels, as Mr. PENDLETON does.

He believes the war to be atrocious and wicked, as Mr. PENDLETON does.

He is in favor of saying to the rebels, "Depart in peace," as Mr. PENDLETON is.

If Mr. CHURCH and the friends of his candidate, General M'CLELLAN agrees entirely with the rebels; for if Mr. PENDLETON'S theory of our Government be correct, secession is strictly Constitutional. What a pleasing President of the United States such a theorist would make!

It is wise to insist that the Chicago candidates hold the same views, for they will be obliged to follow the same policy if elected. Whoever votes for the one necessarily votes for the other, and they stand side by side upon the Chicago platform.

GENERALS AT PLAY.

While SHERIDAN'S name is upon all lips and in all hearts the following passage from EDMUND KIRKE'S "Down in Tennessee" is timely:

"As SHERIDAN'S I saw RODGERS'S cabinet. The box which is always strung loose its power; no workers, such is he, wear out their implements. The box of relaxation is the time to learn any man, and I tried to study him. Sometimes he was playing at billiards with TODD TEN-PINS.' On the lawn in front of his quarters, between two immense elms, he had suspended a long rope, and to the end of it erected a small common-ball. On the ground, midway between these trees, was a square board which I at first took for a target, but on throwing the ball to that it would miss the pin in going out and strike three to come back. Then I saw that the board was laid to be given to the rope by bending the wrist, and it seemed almost impossible to avoid hitting the pin in the rebound. Three 'throws' were a 'game,' and 'thirty 'strokes' could be made. SHERIDAN, by such practice, had become an expert in bowling, and could always command his ball 'strokes,' but a novice did well if he made ten. He and RODGERS, SHERMAN, and the dozen others took him, to the fun. SHERIDAN opened the play, cleared the board at every throw, missed it altogether the third time. 'Twenty,' cried the 'scorer,' and another player took his place. He was equally successful, and, after playing for more or less success, though none came up to SHERIDAN'S 'score.'

"Now for the General,' shouted 'the Major,' laughing as RODGERS took his place. 'He'll score thirty, sure.'

"Don't laugh till you win, my boy,' answered the General, with his peculiar smile.

"Calculating deliberately the motion of the ball, he let it go. Every pin fell, on the direct throw, and a general laugh followed. Not at all discomposed, he then again slid his ball played three or four 'games' with nearly the same success. Amidst the loud congratulation in the which accompanied the last 'game,' SHERIDAN was declaring the bets. 'It's nothing but mathematics,' said GARRETT; 'and I'll bet you a hundred that I can beat you.' Declining the ball, he cleared the board and scored twenty 'strokes.'

"'You ought to shut again.'

"'I'll not disappoint the modest Brigadier, and he did do it, several times in succession.

"'I can do better than that,' said RODGERS, again taking the ball. A shout of derision followed the boast, but he quietly set himself to work, and, half a dozen times in succession, made from twenty-five to thirty 'strokes.'"

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

The speech of the President in response to the serenade from the loyal Marylanders in Washington is so simple and manly, so full and characteristic, that we print it entire, and commend it to the thoughtful perusal of every faithful citizen, soldier, or sailor in the country. We must ask him if this is a dangerous man to trust with the administration of the Government:

"I am satisfied that this is a compliment paid me by the loyal Marylanders resident in this District. I infer that the adoption of the new Constitution for the State furnishes the occasion, and that it is given in the confidence that slavery constitutes the chief merit of the new Constitution. Most heartily do I congratulate you and Maryland, and the nation, and the world, upon the event. I regret that it did not come sooner, that it came, while, I am sure, would have saved to the nation more money than would have sent all the parties into bankruptcy to the amount; but it has come at last, and I sincerely hope its friends may now realize all their anticipations of good from it, and that its opponents may be so effectu, be agreeably and profitably disappointed. A word upon another subject: Something said by the Attorney-General in a recent speech at Auburn, has been construed by some into a threat that, if they misname, I will hereafter hold them traitors. I did not the end of my Constitutional term do what I may be able to ruin the Government. Others regard the fact that the Chicago Convention did not vote die but to meet again if called to do so by a particular individual as the ultimatum of the party, and as a menace that he elected he will at once seize control of the Government. I hope the good sense of the people will continue to suffer no menace here on either point. I am struggling to maintain the Government, not to overthrow it. I therefore say that I shall live I shall not voluntarily abandon the office of next March. And whoever shall be constitutionally elected, therefore, he will be duly installed as President on the 4th of March, and that in the interval I shall by my utmost ability endeavor to hold the helm for the next voyage shall start with the best possible chance to save the ship. This is due to the people, both personally and under the Constitution. These will, constitutionally expressed, is the ultimate law for all. If they should deliberately resolve to have immediate peace at the sacrifice of their country and their liberties, I know not the power or the right to resist them. It is their own business, and they must d' as they please with their own. I believe, however, that the majority will preserve their country and their liberty; and in this, in office or out of it, I am resolved to stand by them. I may add, that in the progress—to—not yet ended, I have no objection—the class of people seem to dantly unanimous as the soldiers in the field and the Treasury abroad. Do they not have the basket of it? Who should quail when they do not? God bless the soldiers and seamen, and all their brave commanders!"

GENERAL SHERMAN AND THE ARMY VOTE.

Rebels shrink from SHERMAN'S sword and Copperheads from his pen. A foolish story has been circulated that he had said ninety-nine out of every hundred of the soldiers in the army would vote for M'Clellan. General Sherman flanks and routs the falsehood in the following letter:

"Headquarters Military Division of the Mississippi, In the Field, Kingston, Ga., Oct. 11, 1864.

"My Dear Sir: There is not one word of truth in the paragraph you sees me out from the New York Herald of September 30. I never thought, said, or wrote that M'Clellan would get ninety-nine out of every hundred votes in the army. I am as ignorant of the political bias of the soldiers as I am of that of the same number of a thousand miles, and I would as soon think of tampering with a soldier's vote as with his prospective pension for men. I have not and shall not attempt to influence a vote in the coming struggle. I believe Mr. LINCOLN has done the best he could, and I respect, etc. W. T. SHERMAN.

"JOHN C. HAMILTON, Esq."

JUDGE VANDERPOEL UPON THE CRISIS.

Hon. Aaron Vanderpoel says, in a late letter to a Union meeting in Lisle County:

"I voted against Mr. LINCOLN in 1860, and for HORATIO SEYMOUR in 1863, but I am called upon, by every obligation of duty and patriotism, to cast my vote for ABRAHAM LINCOLN and ANDREW JOHNSON.

"My duties is that, as the rebels began the war without cause, they must end it by laying down their arms and submitting to that Government against which they have risen in rebellion. I can see in the election of M'Clellan and Pendleton nothing but the breaking up of the Union. I can see in Pendleton a prominent supporter of M'Clellan, this as the Chicago nominee will be bound to carry out the principles of the Chicago platform, which has not a word of fault to find with the rebels, and goes for peace at all events, and at any price.

"I, too, am for peace, but I am for a peace which is honorable—not for one which brings disgrace and humiliation to the North. I am for peace which shall maintain making M'Clellan and Pendleton my peace-makers. My peace-makers are GRANT, SHERMAN, SCHOFIELD, and FARRAGUT, and the hosts of 1 yal and gallant spirits under them; the sons of Freemen, who have so triumphantly pushed their rebellion foe to the last ditch."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE VIRGINIA CAMPAIGN.

The prominent topic of the week is General Sheridan's victory in the Shenandoah Valley.

On Saturday, October 15, General Sheridan went to Washington, leaving General Wright in command of the army, which was situated on the turnpike from Strasburg to Winchester, with the Sixth Corps, the Eighth Corps on the left, the Nineteenth in the centre, and the Sixth on the right. The cavalry, under Torbert, was on the right of the division. The enemy, under command of General Early, was intrenched at Fisher's Hill, a few miles southward of Strasburg. The Federal army also intrenched itself, occupying a line running nearly east and north, and situated on a commanding elevation. Monday morning, the 17th, the enemy made an attack on our right, which was sword the purpose both of a reconnoissance and a feint, as it was intended finally to attack on the left. Tuesday passed without an engagement, and a Federal reconnoissance made that day appeared to settle the fact of Early's continued presence in force at Fisher's Hill. The rebel army consisted of five infantry divisions under Gordon, Ramseur, Pegram, Wharton, and Kershaw. With this force, numbering nearly 30,000 men, Early attacked on Wednesday morning before light.

At dawn the battle began. Three divisions—Ferguson's, Ramseur's, and Gordon's—were advanced against our left, while Pegram and Kershaw marched against our centre along the Winchester pike. The attack on the left was a perfect surprise, and produced the effect. It was made without the usual preliminary of a skirmish. Almost all the first shots were fired by men taken and a large number of guns; the advantage thus gained was pursued; the enemy's movements were private, and a large force of prisoners taken. In Crook's rear was a provisional division commanded by Colonel Molineux, which was routed.

The other two divisions at the same time advanced and attacked Getty's and Thoburn's Corps, which were on the left flank by Crook's retreat. Here also breast-works and guns were taken. The rebel artillery meanwhile, posted in commanding situations on the opposite side of Cedar Creek, continued to pour shot in upon our unprotected rear. The whole left was soon retreating on the Winchester pike toward Middletown.

North of the road was posted the Sixth Corps and the cavalry, which had as yet taken no part in the battle. The cavalry, moving in rear, soon appeared on the left, and checked the enemy's advance. The Sixth Corps followed in the same direction, coming up on the left of the Nineteenth Corps. Here the battle was about to be lost at bay, and the entire Federal line was withdrawn a short distance to a more defensible position. Our army followed close, and more guns were taken, on account of the difficulty in getting them off. At last, the Union artillery drivers suffered great loss in horses and men, and the guns were abandoned. There was no attempt of an organization to repel two vigorous charges of the rebels. Crook, continued to pour in upon our rear, and the cavalry on the left it was necessary to withdraw the Sixth and Nineteenth Corps from the centre, to sustain the position just taken by the rebels. Up to this time twenty-four guns had been taken from us, and a great number of prisoners. Our troops exhibited the line of retreat, among whom were several able officers, including the General commanding Division, English Corps, had been killed; also General Bidwell, commanding Second Brigade, Second Division, Sixth Corps; General Ricketts, commanding the Sixth Corps, had been wounded, and General Wright himself was severely wounded in the thigh.

The troops had slept at Winchester the previous night, but hearing the cannonade in the morning he took his horse and joined his old friend Sheridan on the field, arriving on the field at ten o'clock A.M., just at the time when the rout was commencing on the left. On his way he had met the throng of wounded and stragglers. Sheridan was greatly gratified by the arrival of Wright.

The new line of battle ran as follows: The Nineteenth Corps on the right, the Sixth in the centre, and the reserved Eighth Corps on the left. Custer's division was on the extreme right, and Merritt's on the left. The cavalry commenced the fight at once, and continued it from o'clock Sheridan assumed the offensive and attacked. The enemy made a desperate charge on either wing, which was followed by an impetuous advance on the centre. The whole line was immediately in full flight, and followed up the retreat, reaping the fruits of a decisive victory; all the guns lost were recaptured, fully as many more in addition taken from the enemy; and 5000 prisoners were captured, including 300 officers. The enemy continued the pursuit to Mount Jackson. The entire rebel loss is estimated at about 10,000. Nearly 15,000 stands of arms have been taken.

LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT TO GENERAL SHERIDAN.

The following is a copy of a letter addressed to General Sheridan by the President:

"Executive Mansion, Washington, ,c. 27, 1864.

"Major-General Sheridan—It gives me pleasure to tender to you and your brave army the thanks of the nation and my own personal gratitude for your recent battle for the month's operations in the Shenandoah Valley, and especially for the splendid work of October 19. Your obedient servant, Abraham Lincoln."

THE WESTERN CAMPAIGN.

Hood is no doubt retreating southward, with Sherman in pursuit. There are new developments every day made in regard to the designs of the rebel cavalry under Forrest, which was to have joined Hood's army, and to cut and General Buat at Lexington, Missouri, the zenith of which was a Federal victory. General Forrest is retreating southward.

THE ST. ALBANS RAID.

In the afternoon of October 19 considerable disturbance was occasioned in St. Albans, Vermont, by the appearance in the town of armed marauders from the Canada side, who, under pretence of being Confederate soldiers, robbed a number of the banks and citizens of considerable sum of money from the banks. After securing their booty they again returned into Canada. Captain Conger, with a detachment of men, immediately started in pursuit. They succeeded in recovering the greater part of the marauders and in recovering $150,000 of the stolen money. Governor Smith, of Vermont, has telegraphed, offering to respond to a requisition from the United States Government for the delivery of the robbers, as many of them as could be found. Their trial was delayed by considerable technicalities, and in a few hours the whole frontier was under arms.

NEWS ITEMS.

The steamer Roanoke was captured by pirates October 7, while on her way from Havana to New York. It was taken by the pirates to the Bermudas, where Dr. Beales, the leader of the piratical gang, was also the leader in the Chesapeake affair. Beales has been arrested together with his associates, and imprisoned at Bermuda. The British Government has taken the matter in hand.

Henry C. Niles, a clerk employed in the city delivery department of the New York Post-office, was arrested a few days ago by Mr. J. Guyler, the Special Agent of the Post-office Department, on a charge of forging and stealing mail-letters. It was the duty of the accused to receive the letters which are taken out by drivers-for-carriers, and it is charged that he availed himself of the opportunity to abstract letters containing money, opened them, and destroyed the envelopes. The prisoner admitted his guilty to Mr. Guyler, and the chief evidence of it was also found upon his person. He was taken before United States Commissioner Shields, and held to bail in $5000.

Brigadier-General Paine, commanding the District of Florida, has been relieved by order of his own request. Brigadier-General John Cook, of Springfield, will succeed him in command of the District.

The County Volunteer Committee are now receiving the considerable amount. The committee have offered by the county are $400 for three years, $300 for two years, and $200 for one year. Those who have been already bounty and $100 for one year. Those who have been already bounty and $100 for one year. Those who have been already bounty and $100

ADAMS EXPRESS OFFICE AT CITY POINT, VIRGINIA, ON PAY-DAY.—[SKETCHED BY J. R. HAMILTON.]

ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY.

WE give on this page a sketch representing the appearance of ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY'S OFFICE, AT CITY POINT, VIRGINIA, during the time that the ever-welcome Paymaster is on a visit among the troops. This time is selected because it is then that the officers and men of the army—the transmission of whose money forms the principal business of the branch of the Company located there—come in upon the office in overwhelming crowds.

"Few people," says our artist, "in looking at that rough, common-looking barge, moored along the wharf at City Point—and which many hardly recognize as the office of Adams Express Company, in spite of the large flag at the stern announcing the fact plainly enough—could imagine the vast amount of business transacted on board of it. Having to do not only the freighting, but what literally amounts to the banking business of the thousands comprising an army, one may suppose is no ordinary labor; but very few who have not witnessed the modus operandi can realize how immensely that labor is increased by the necessary lack of all those technical facilities by which banking establishments are carried on, and which it is impossible to find in a temporary base of an army constantly in motion. It is an average thing, irrespective of the large amount of freight constantly going to and from the office at Clay Point, for from 50,000 to 75,000 dollars in money to be daily transmitted, in individual packages, from the soldiers to their friends at home; and there are days when the aggregate can not fall short of 150,000 dollars.

"These packages, after having their contents duly counted and receipted, have to be sealed up with the large proportions of sealing-wax, stamped by the Company's seal, and then read over and tallied—a tedious mechanical labor often reaching far into the night. The whole of the work in this important branch of the Company devolves upon one responsible agent and seven assistants."

THE PRICE OF A KISS.

WHEN I was a boy—a tall, strapping young fellow of seventeen or eighteen—father was a farmer, and owned that piece of ground yonder. It was a fine farm then, though they've run a railway through it now, and to do with their improvements. In those days we were content to travel by the stage or on shank's mare; and I must confess I don't think we've gained much by the change except explosions, though you mayn't agree with me there —youngsters never do. Just here stood Old Widow Trabb's tavern—the Jolly Farmer. Tavern was no disgrace then, though you'd insult a hotel to call it one now. They hadn't much trade, any company there; but folk stopped on the way up by the stage, and drovers and farmers on the way to market took their meals there. Of winter evenings the Squire, and the Doctor, and even the Parson, used to come over to taste old Trabb's ale and have a chat with him. He was a well-educated, lighthearted old man, who had fought when young in the Peninsular War; and though he sometimes could drink and laugh with fellows young enough to be his grandsons. Such stories as he used to tell of his campaigning and hard-fighting escapes would make your hair stand on end with horror. We youngsters never doubted a word of them then, whatever we do now at times. With his large bulky figure, and red face, and loud voice, he was the strangest contrast to his daughter Mehitabel—Hitty—as she called her. She was like some slender white lily in those days, and her voice no louder than some silver bell, and just as musical—a little bird that had come home from school, and ready to cry with fright at the thought of having to take her part in the mistress's for you we her mother had been dead years and years. The tombstone in the church-yard was just as old as Hitty, and she was only seventeen about the house.

In a little while she grew used to it, and less timid; and then from looking at her at a distance I came to speak to her. The first time was at the great gate that opened upon the road from the back of the house. It was heavy and hard to open, and seeing her little hands busy with it I went across and set it back for her; and she said, "Thank you —you're very kind to take so much trouble."

"No trouble at all, Miss Hitty," I said; "it's a pleasure." And then she blushed, and I felt the blood rush into my face, though I don't suppose she noticed it, for we went with work to the open air, and the sun, and sheepishness, I was about as red as I well could be all the time in those days.

After that we met, and smiled, and spoke when we met; and at last one Sunday evening I mustered up resolution, and dressed myself in my best, and put a rose in my button-hole, and took a bouquet for her, and went across the fields to Widow Trabb's. Two or three times I felt like turning back, or running somewhere; but I screwed my courage to the sticking point and got to the door. I was in a cold sweat. That I'd have made up my mind to go in if she hadn't been sitting there on the porch reading her prayer-book. She put it in her pocket, and looked up and smiled.

"How do you do, Mr. Maffit?" she said. "I'm glad to see you. Walk in." And she took me into the little parlor and handed me a chair.

I can remember that room just as if it was yesterday. There was a home-made carpet, red and yellow stripes, on the floor; and a mahogany sofa-table you could see your face in between the windows; and all about the room was waiscoated and painted like those of a lady as poor waist. Above it was whitewashed. The mantle-piece was higher than your head, and had plated candlesticks at its beautyaddy on it; and on the wall were two paper profiles one of old Wither, and the other of his wife, cut at a fair where they were sweet-hearts. The chairs had rush bottoms and were painted black, and there were green window-papers tied up with tassels at the windows. There was a white china dog and a black apron, and had a string of coral beads about her little throat. I remember it all like a picture—most of all her pretty eyes, looking down at the stripes in the carpet.

"I'm nice evening, Miss Hetty," said, to say something, as I ought.

"Very," she answered. "I'm always glad of a bright Sunday." Rain keeps the people from church, and makes it dull besides.

"I saw you in church this morning," I said.

"I saw you too," replied Hetty, and then there was silence. She plaited her apron strings, and I stared at her.

"I see you've plenty of flowers, Miss Hetty," I said: "but mother has such good luck with her carnations. I thought I'd bring you a few, if you'd accept them;" and I handed her my nosegay. She smiled and took them.

"They're beautiful," she said. "I'll put them in water;" and she went out and brought in a clean, polished beer-glass half full of water and set them in it; and having something to do with her hands and eyes grew less bashful. And we talked about flowers and seeds and gardening for a good while.

When the moon was up we went out on the porch and sat there." And she told me about her old school, and a teacher who was very kind to her, and of her first sorrow, the death of her own father, and that he was so fond of her.

"For you see," she said, "I'd been away so long I knew nothing about home, and not much even about pa."

"I'm sure," said I, "the less was his, and if you were my daughter I'd not send you to school away from me one day." And then I was so conscious that I'd made a silly speech that I said "good night" in quite a short way, and wished the earth would open and swallow me.

That was my first visit to Hetty, but not the last. Pretty soon I went up to see her every Sunday night, and waited on her to singing-school, and had got so used to it that it was a natural vocation the first night it was only a queer hanky growling and cold express my own ideas, and as they were, in something like comprehensible language.

Hetty had read more than I had ever heard of. She was well educated for a girl in those days, and she made me wonder at her smartness when she was not afraid of talking. She wrote a pretty hand, too, and could play the wonderful piano. My only fear was that I was too homely, and rough and countrified to suit her. Father knew where I got Sunday clothes, and laughed about my prospering; but mother was anxious. She thought that Hetty was not just the girl for a farmer's wife. A fancy, and she was right in the end that I should marry my far-away cousin, Ann Dolling. But I took my own way, and married the kind but little Hetty every day. I hope, too, that she likes me better. At last there had been an apple-paring at neighbor Wetherby's, and dancing; and as there pretty fingers, and the next minute we were standing face to face quite still, with both her hands in mine.

"Oh, Hetty!" I said, "please don't be angry; but I love you—you—you—you—there's no use. Ever since that first evening I've felt that if you should say I might not have that little hand to keep I should weep. I'm not sure what there is in me to like; but, Hetty, for Heaven's sake try to like me enough to be my wife. The best and handsomest fellow in the world couldn't be fonder of you than I am."

She wouldn't look up. She wouldn't speak. I tried to set her free, but she held me tighter still. But when I put my arm about her she did not seem angry, and I drew her to my heart and held her there long enough to kiss her twenty times; and then we walked on over the fields, and I thanked God for giving me so great a treasure. Old Widow Trabb was not opposed to the match; but when I talked to him about it as Hetty bade me, he said,

"If the girl has set her heart on it she may marry you, but I don't know her yet, and you are both young enough to wait a couple of years; so it was settled that we should not marry for two years from that time on my Hetty's nineteenth birthday. "All the better," said the old folks, and Hetty was content; but I felt more than ever in my own. She was so lovely that I fancied every man in the world must envy me.

As for my dress I did I'd have stated my soul and that's a pretty heavy stake, that I never could have done it. I was bewitched, I think, or Satan took possession of me. I'll tell you how it happened. We had been engaged a year—Hetty and I—I think, when a pretty Southern girl came to stay with Widow Trabb for the benefit of her health. She had an opportunity of making a show, for her father owned plenty of donkeys, and gave her all the money she wanted. She struggled, and gave herself airs, and wondered how any woman could be happy with a man who worked, and with slipshod shoes came with her to wait on her, and she never poured out the water to wash her own hands. She put false curls on her own little head, but Hetty only laughed at her. Why I never knew, but she took a notion to me—she glanced and smiled—she wasn't troubled by laughing at first after a while I found myself talking to her a great deal, and thinking very often how pretty she was. One or twice Hetty looked hard at a little gift that after a while I found myself talking to her a great deal, and thinking very often how pretty she was. One or twice Hetty looked hard at a little gift that after the pairs and husking-frolics where we met Miss Princely; but I never thought of her being jealous, for Hetty had no reason to be very living thing, and it seemed to me she must know it.

One day, or rather evening, I had been dancing with this Southern girl, and was about to leave her when she gave a little laugh and said,

"I thought you had staid quite as long as you dared."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Oh, we all know that you're courting you are tied to!" she replied. "I only wonder you dare leave her side at all."

"I dare do any thing I choose," said I.

"No," she laughed, "you daren't dance the next three dances with me."

"But I will," said I; and I sat down beside her. I saw her eyes glitter, and I did not dare to look toward Hetty. Soon the music struck up, and we danced together. Hetty had another partner. I envied him her little white hand, but I could not bring myself to be laughed at, and I danced not only three but four times with Miss Princely.

"You're braver than I thought," she said, when we were through. "Now run away and be forgiven."

My heart gave a strange little leap as she said those words, but I answered by a laugh and kept close to her all supper-time. People were talking about it, I knew, for all were well aware that Hetty and I were engaged to each other; but that girl's sneer seemed to have made a fool of me, and I determined to show her that I was my own master.

When I left her at last, she said: "I am going away the day after to-morrow for good. If you dare come over and see me to-morrow evening—"

"I'll be there," I said, and then I went to the arch of Hetty. She was not there. Dr. Brae and his wife had gone home early, and she had gone with them in their gig.

All sad and long after that.

The best part of that night I passed walking up and down before her window. There was a light within, and I could see that a little shadow crossed the curtain. If I could have seen her then all would have been right, but it was too late, and I went home just in time to change my dress and be called to breakfast.

The day was a long one. It was a busy time, and I couldn't leave my work; but I thought of Hetty all the while. What apology could I make? I could only tell her the truth, and how nearly that ended.

"Tied to her apron-string," and she the greatest thing that ever lived, who never strove to rule me.

I almost hated Miss Princely for that speech now.

But Hetty was so good and sweet-tempered she would forgive me, and this the first time I had offended, and I made short work of the mush and milk at supper, and was up stairs and dressed and off in less time than I've been all of it.

When I reached the house, old Trabb was taking supper by himself. "Looking for Hetty?" he asked. "She's off upstairs. Some dressmaker's woman or her knitting work and said she'd be out late. So up and take a chair."

But I was too restless, and hurt besides. It was one of my regular evenings, and Hetty must have known I would come. I thought her very cool and unkind; and then in a spirit of pique I made up my mind to go to Butler and see Miss Princely at her cousin's.

It was a three-miles' walk, and was quite dark when I got there. They lived in the street of Butler, a very pretty house, with their gardens joining, just separated by pretty little hedges. Miss Princely was alone. "So glad to see you," she said. "I said you'd not go myself," and she smiled, and dimpled, and looked prettier than ever. Then she played to me on the piano, and afterward supper the colored woman brought in coffee and cakes and cold chicken, and we had a little supper.

I didn't know then, but I made up my mind to enjoy that evening, and the supper over we walked up and down in the garden. Next door, with the hedge between us, some girls were chatting, but their laughs and voices were the only sounds that disturbed the silence.

"I'm sorry to-morrow," said Miss Princely, after a little while.

"I am very sorry to hear it," said I.

"I don't believe you," she said, pouting.

"Why not?"

"You don't seem if all the world were going," she said. "If you were to hear I were dead to-morrow you'd never grieve."

"Indeed I should."

"Oh, you men!" she said, coquettishly. "But do you know my poor little bones quite long for home again? I'm so miserably here as nobody can advances. My hands are quite chapped, and my lips, just look at them." She pursed them up in the very tempting way and I took forward.

"I can't see," I said. "It's too dark, I must tell by the sense of touch."

It's almost as much a bashful fellow as I had been could have grown so saucy on a soldier's; but I told you before I was bewitched. I had kissed her as I spoke, and she gave me a little soft slap, and said, "Oh, how dare you?" in any thing but an angry voice.

"They're very soft yet for chapped lips," I said; and just then turning, I saw in the moonlight a face at the window over the hedge that I knew well divided the two gardens. There for a moment stood Hetty looking at us both. The next I saw it sink, and I heard a cry. "Why, what is the matter with Hetty? I think she has fainted."

How much she heard I never knew, but I know she saw me kiss Miss Princely.

The next day a farm-hand brought me a little parcel and a note from Hetty:

"I am going immediately," she wrote. "I wish you could return all the love I have given you. It is over now, but I am ashamed of ever having cared for one so treacherous and fickle."

Those cold words only. Five hours afterward I had left home and was far away, with only a few words to my mother and a bundle of clothes—I'd stick over my shoulders.

I reached my ship to sail for England when I reached New York, and I shipped before the mast.

I went half around the world, and went to many a land, but I never found Hetty, and I knew I never could be happy again; but I was most like myself in a storm, or when there was any danger that excited me. One thing that brought old in scars I never cared to look at or speak to a woman when we went ashore; pretty or ugly, young or old, it was all the same to me. I wrote to mother, but not often, and I never asked a question about Hetty. I didn't care to hear what I supposed I should, but she had written to some one.

When my mother died father was not fond of writing, and I sent him presents instead of letters, and had no chance of hearing.

I'll not make my long story longer by telling of my adventures at sea, or how we came, after I was first mate, to fall in with a pirate on the high seas. We beat him; but I was wounded, and they took me up for dead. I lived, however; and though I had lost a leg, and had a great scar across my cheek, seemed likely to live. I came back to America, and my heart being softened by a long illness, I longed to see home and my good old father; so from New York I traveled to my native place. I was thirty-six years old on the day when I limped through Butler, where the stage stopped, and saw the garden in which I had given Miss Princely that kiss which had cost me so much. My heart was so full that I could have wept. Butler and our place had grown such near neighbors that they were almost one. Only two or three green fields lay between them. A new street had been built, and the tavern now stood on that. It was much altered, and wings and another story, but there was a sign—The Town Hotel, W. Trabb. A boy was lounging at the door.

"Is old Mr. Trabb living yet?" I asked.

"Yes, Sir," said the boy; "and he's right smart, though they say he's over ninety."

"He'll not remember me," I thought. "I'll go in and see him.

I knew the way to the parlor, and I went toward it. The hall was oil-clothed and painted, and when I looked into the room I hardly knew it. Its walls were papered, and it was furnished as modern parlors were. But I did know the form that stood there—the slight, fair woman, with the bands of golden hair—Hetty—older, but with hardly a single sweet girl changed to a lovely woman. She bent over the hair in which her old father sat, and, standing there, I heard him speak, his tones thicker than of yore and with a quiver in them.

"Mr. dear, I wish you'd think twice of this. I'm sure John Westbrook would make you a good husband. I'd like to see you married before I die."

"Pa," I heard she answered, "I'm too old to marry. I'm thirty-five."

"A mere child yet," said the old man. "And you might have been married many times. I don't want to lose you; but John would take the husband, and we'd live together. Make up your mind to marry him."

"I can't, papa; indeed I can't marry. John Westbrook. I tried to like him, and he did me a kind—"

"I can't see why you should throw your life away," said the old man.

"Nor I, papa," she said, "it is not wasting my life to spend it with you. I have never loved any one but poor Arthur Maffit, and it would be very wrong to marry without loving. His had all I ever had to give."

"The sea can not give up its dead," said the old man.

"Amen!" she said, and bent her head upon his shoulder and wept aloud.

I stood there in the threshold and stood before them.

"Hetty, I am not worthy of your tears," I said. And, with a cry, she turned and fell fainting in my arms.

An hour after we sat alone together, and I said to her:

"Hetty, I have no right, altered as I am after so many years, to ask if you remember me as you have loved you, better than his life? Will you be a crippled sailor's wife, Hetty, or must I take to my lonely way again, and bear my punishment until I die?"

I waited for my answer, not daring to look at her until she put her little white hand into mine, hand in my brown, rough palms, and left it there.

RETALIATION.

IN 1845 I was attached as surgeon-major to the military hospital of Constantine. This hospital rises in the form of a fortified block, over a precipice of from three to four hundred feet in height. It commands an open view of the city, the plain, the sea, and the vast plain beyond, as far as the eye can reach. It is at once a comprehensive and a savage picture. From the window, left open to admit the fresh breezes of the evening, I could see the vultures and ravens soaring around the inaccessible cliffs, and the jackals looking for the night in the stones and crevices. I could easily throw my cigar into the Rummel, which flows along the foot of the giant rock. The noise of the city, not a murmur even, but the calm of my studies, till the evening bugle and drums, repeated by the echoes of the fortress, called me home to the officers' quarters.

Garrison life had never any charms for me; I never could understand how a man could devote one or to the petit verre de cognac. At the time I am now speaking about that was called wanting in spirit de corps, and I was looked upon as a bad Frenchman by having that kind of "esprit." I occupied myself there with visiting my patients, prescribing for them, and when I had returned to my rooms made notes of the cases, to read a book, or sit at the window contemplating the wild, gloomy, savage scene before me.

Every one got accustomed to, and put up with, my retiring habits, save a certain Lieutenant Count de Carlo, Castagnac by name, whom I must introduce to you in propriâ personæ.

On my arrival at Constantine, getting down from the carriage, a voice shouted out behind me:

"Viens! I'll lay a bet that is our surgeon-major."

I turned round and found myself in the presence of an infantry officer, tall, thin, bony, with a red beard, gray mustache, his kepi over his ear, its peak stabbing the sky, his sword between his legs; it was Lieutenant Castagnac, and who has not seen this extraordinary type?

While I was familiarizing my eyes with this strange physiognomy, the Lieutenant had seized my hand:

"Welcome, Doctor! Delighted to make your acquaintance. You are two, I am two. Come in. I will introduce you to the 'Cercle.'"

The "Cercle" at Constantine was the restaurant and bar of the officers united. We went in. How was it possible to resist the sympathetic enthusiasm of such a man? And yet I had read "Gil Blas!"

"Garçon, two glasses. What do you take, Doctor—cognac or rum?"

"Neither, Garçons, if you please."

"Curaçoa! Why not say 'parfait amour at once? Ah, ah, ah! you have a strange taste.

Gurçon, a glass of absinthe for me, full to the brim; be attentive. Your health, Doctor!"

"Yours, Lieutenant!"

And so I was forthwith in the good graces of this strange man. But it is needless to tell you that the intimacy did not last long. Castagnac had habits that were especially antagonistic to my own. But I made the acquaintance of other officers, who joined me in laughing at the originality of the character. Among them was a young man of merit, Raymond Dutertre, who said that he had likewise been obliged to drop his acquaintance, but that Castagnac having taken it up as a personal affront, they had gone outside the walls, and he, Dutertre, had administered to him a severe chastisement, which displeased him all the more, as he had previously bullied with impunity, on the faith of one or two successful duels.

Things were in this condition, when about the middle of June a malignant fever broke out in Constantine, and among the hospital patients were both Castagnac and Dutertre; but Castagnac was not there for fever, he was invalided by that strange nervous affection called delirium tremens (and in our bashful army, D.T.), and which is especially common among those who in Algeria are given to the frequent imbibition of absinthe. Poor Castagnac used to get out of his bed during the attacks, and run along the floor on all fours, as if he was catching rats; he also mewed like a cat, and the only words that he uttered were, "Fatima! oh, Fatima!" A circumstance that induced me to suppose that the poor fellow had experienced some disappointment in love, for which he had sought consolation in the abuse of spirituous liquors.

When he recovered from his fit he would invariably ask the same question:

"What did I say, Doctor? Did I say anything?"

I naturally replied that he had said nothing of importance, and made him quiet himself; but he was not satisfied, and after trying to search my inner thoughts with his fierce eyes he would give up the attempt and resign himself to his co ch, with the equally invariable observation:

"A glass of absinthe would do me a gre- deal of good."

One morning, as I was entering into Castagnac's room, I saw Dutertre, who was nearly convalescent, hastening after me along the passage.

"Doctor," he said, taking me by the hand, "I have come to ask you a favor. Will you give me permission to go out for a day?"

"Any thing, my dear friend, but that. The fever is still raging in the town, and I can not expose you to a relapse.

"Well, give me then two hours—the time to go and come back."

"It is impossible, my good friend. In another week, if you go on well, we will see what can be done."

He withdrew, evidently deeply chagrined. I was sorry, but could not help it, but on turning round was surprised to see Castagnac making signs to me, during suitor with a strange look.

"What was he asking for?" he inquired.

"Oh, nothing! he wanted to go out, but I could not sanction it."

"You refused him permission, then?" persevered the sick man.

"It was my duty to do so."

Castagnac said no more, but resumed his recumbent position, with a grim smile, I was almost about to say a diabolical expression of countenance, which I could not account for, but which filled me with strange apprehensions.

That same evening my duties called me to the amphitheatre, where an autopsy chained my attention. The so-called amphitheatre was in reality a vaulted dungeon fifteen feet long by twenty wide, with two windows opening upon the principe and looking in the direction of the high road to Philippeville. The body lay upon a table in the middle, and my lamp was placed upon a stone that advanced out of the wall, and I remained engaged in my examination till nine o'clock. At that hour I left off, at length, I was horrified at seeing the window blocked up by innumerable owls, small and gray-colored, with their heads and breast, that were pretty white, like through the semi-obscurity. They were waiting till I had done.

I rushed terrified to the window and drove the rapacious birds away, like so many great dead leaves carried on by the night wind. But, at the very moment, I heard a noise—a strange noise, almost imperceptible in the depth of the abyss. I stopped, and putting my head out of the window held my breath so as to catch the sounds more distinctly. Castagnac's room was immediately over the amphitheatre; and there, between the projection of the wall of the hospital, was a space, not above a foot in width, covered with broken pottery and bottles; the refuse of the hospital. In the stillness of the night around I could distinctly hear a man groping his way along this dangerous shelf.

"Heaven grant!" I said to myself, "that the sentinel does not see him. A single false step, and he is a lost man."

I had barely had time to make this reflection to myself, when I heard the hoarse voice of Castagnac calling out from above:

"Raymond, where are you going?"

It was a condemnation to death. At the very instant I heard some of the broken pottery slipping down the incline, followed by the fall of a heavy body. I heard the sighs of a man struggling as if to hold for his life—a groan that went to the inmost marrow of my bones, and bedewed my forehead with a cold, clammy perspiration, and then all was over! Not exactly all, for I heard a diabolical burst of laughter above, and then a window closed with such impetuosity that it was followed by the sound of broken glass. And then the deep silence of night spread its shroud over this frightful drama.

After I had somewhat recovered from the state of inexpressible horror in which I had been thrown, I mechanically took the light, and, wending my way to the spot, soon, I went to the body. I knew, however, was out of the question: all night long I was haunted by those lamentable sighs and by that demoniac laugh. The next morning a feeling of horror came over me, which prevented me verifying my impressions till I had visited all my patients. It was not till that was accomplished that I directed my steps to Dutertre's room. I knocked; there was no answer. I entered; there was no one there. I inquired of the hospital attendants: no one had seen him go out. Summoning all my courage, I went next to Castagnac's room. A glance at the window satisfied me that two panes were broken.

"It blew hard, Lieutenant, last night," I remarked.

Castagnac lifted up his head, till then buried in his busy hands, as if in the act of reading. "Parbleu!" he said; "two panes broken, only that!"

"Your room, Lieutenant, appears to be more exposed than others, or, perchance, you left your window open?"

An almost imperceptible muscular contraction furrowed the cheeks of the old miscreant, and he at the same time fixed on me his black look at me that I felt glad of a pretense to withdraw. Just as I was going out I turned back suddenly, as if I had forgotten to ask a question:

"By-the-by, Lieutenant, has Dutertre been to see you?"

A shudder passed through his gray hairs.

"Dutertre?"

"Yes, he is gone out, and no one knows where. I thought, perhaps—"

"No one has been to see me," he interrupted, abruptly; "no one whatever!"

I went out convinced of his guilt, but I had no proofs. I determined to wait and watch, and in the mean time contented myself with reporting the disappearance of Lieutenant Raymond Dutertre to the commandant de place.

Next day some Arabs, coming with vegetables to the market of Constantine, made known that they had seen from the road to Philippeville a uniform dangling in the air on the face of the rocks of the Kasbah, and that birds of prey were flying around it in hundreds. From the combination of Waymond, and it was with the greatest possible trouble that they were recovered by letting down men by means of ropes.

The catastrophe furnished subject of conversation to the officers of the garrison for two or three days, and was then forgotten. Dutertre's parents in part every day do not dwell upon unpleasant topics. Jacques des Barres takes his place. The regiment alone is dismissed.

My position with regard to Castagnac grew, in the mean time, more embarrassing. My evasions were constrained in his presence—the very sight of him was repulsive. He soon detected it, and suspicion was awakened in his mind.

"He doubts that I suspect him," I said to myself; "if he was sure of it I should be a lost man—I am willing to stop at nothing."

Providence came to my aid. One afternoon I was leaving the Kasbah for a stroll in the town, when one of the Israelites presented me with a paper, which, he said, had been found in Raymond's tunic.

"It is the letter," he said, "of a 'particulière,' Fatima by name. I thought, Sir, it might interest you."

As I was thus reflecting I had arrived in front of a vaulted building or archway open as usual to the air, and where an old Arab was selling fruit. His Almayun by name, distributed coffee to a few scanty customers. I determined at once to consult this kawaji, so I took my place on the matting by the side of half a dozen natives in their red fezzes with their white cloaks about their heads and their pipes in their lips. The kawaji, without pretending to know me, brought me my pipe and cup of coffee in silence. Having finished my repast, I was waiting to prepare; the faithful rose up, stroked their beards, and departed slowly for the mosque. I was alone.

Said Hassan, the kawaji, came to me to say that he were really so, then approached me, and, kissing my hand, "Lord Taleb," he said, "what brings you to the humble abode of Hassan? How can I your service?"

"I want you to tell me who Fatima is."

"Lord Taleb, in the name of your mother, do not see that woman."

"Why so?"

"She is perdition to the faithful and to the infidel. She possesses a charm that kills. Do not see her!"

"Sidi Ramayun, my resolve is made. She possesses a charm: well! I possess a greater. Here is the red-eyed dragon, and I am the son of Solomon. Tell her that, Sidi; tell her that the wrinkles of age disappear before my charm. I must see her."

"Well, then, since such is your will, Lord Taleb, come back to-morrow at the same hour. But remember what I said to you: Fatima makes an evil use of her beauty."

You may imagine if I awaited the appointed time with impatience. I thought that the moment would never summon the faithful to prayer again. At last his low, plaintive, monotonous voice made itself heard from the top of the minaret, and was taken up from one to another, till it seemed as if soaring over the indolent city. I slowly paced my way to the coffee-house, so as to give time to the guests to retire. Sidi was already shutting up his shop.

"Well!" I said to him, breathless with anxiety.

"Fatima awaits you, Taleb."

He closed the bay, and without further explanation, led the way. Leaving the main street, he entered the Suian, a passage that was avoiding not walk abreast—a mere cloaca, yet crowded with industrious persons of many nations—Moors, Berbers, Jews, Copts, and Arabs. Suddenly Sidi Hassayun stopped at a low door, and knocked.

"Follow me," I said; "you will act as interpreter."

"Fatima can speak Ferench," he replied, without turning his head.

The door was opened by a Nubian slave, who, letting me in, as quickly shut it against the kawaji. She then lead the way to an interior court paved with mosaic work, and upon which several doors opened. The slave pointed to one, by which I entered a room with open windows shaded by silken curtains with Moorish designs. An amber-colored mat covered the floor, while cushions of violet-colored Persian shawls lined the divan, at the extremity of which sat Fatima herself, her eyes veiled by long dark lashes, straight and small nose, pouting lips, and beautiful little feet.

"Come in, Lord Taleb," she said; "Sidi Hassayun has told me of your visit. You are good enough to interest yourself in the fate of poor Fatima, who is getting aged—yes, she will soon be seventeen—seventeen! the age of regrets and wrinkles. Ah! Lord Taleb, sit down, you are welcome!"

I scarcely knew how to reply, but, recovering myself, I said:

"You are with infinite grace, Fatima. I have heard your wit spoken of no less than your beauty, and I see that I have heard the truth."

"Ah!" she exclaimed. "By whom then?"

"By Dutertre."

"Dutertre?"

"Yes, Raymond Dutertre, the young officer who fell over the precipice of the Kasbah. He whom you loved, Fatima!"

She opened her great eyes in surprise.

"Who told you that I loved him?" she inquired, looking at me with a strange expression. "It is false! Did he tell you so?"

"No. But I know it. This letter proves it to me—this letter, which you wrote, and which was the cause of his death, for it was to get to you that he risked himself at night upon the rocks of the Kasbah."

Scarcely had I uttered the words than the young Oriental rose up abruptly, her eyes lit up with a gloomy expression.

"I was sure of it!" she exclaimed. "Yes, when my Nubian brought me word of the accident, I said to her, 'Alas! It is he who has done it. The wretch!'"

"What do you mean, Fatima?" I said, astonished at her anger. "I do not understand you."

"Of whom? Of Castagnac! You are the Taleb of the hospital. You, to whom I gave him poison. He is a wretch. He made me write to the mother to tell him to come here. I refused to do it. Yet this young man is good for any acquaintance for a long time, but I knew that Castagnac owed him a grudge. When I refused he declared he would come out of the hospital to beat me if I did not, so I wrote. Here is his letter."

I went forth from Fatima's with a heavy heart; but my resolution was made. Without hesitating a minute I ascended to the Kasbah, entered the hospital, and knocked at Castagnac's door.

"Come in," he said, "it is you?" he said, forcing a smile. "I did not expect you."

For all answer I showed him the letter that he had written to Fatima. He turned pale, and, having looked at it for a second, made a movement as if to throw himself upon me.

"If you make a step toward me," I said, placing my hand upon the hilt of my sword, "I will kill you like a dog, you wretch. You have assassinated Dutertre. I was at the amphitheatre; I heard all. Do not deny it! Your conduct to him had excited my suspicions; the French officer is lower himself to such a degree of infamy! Listen! I ought to deliver you over to justice, but your dishonor would dishonor the mess. If an order of dismissis within you kill yourself! I grant you till to-morrow. To-morrow by seven, if I find you still living, I will myself take you before the commandant de place."

Having said this, I withdrew without waiting for his reply, and went at once to inform the strictest orders that Lieutenant Castagnac should not be permitted to leave the hospital under any pretext whatever. Since then Castagnac has not been rendered evident to me I had become pitiless. I felt that I would avenge Dutertre. Having procured a torch, such as our spahis use in their night caravans, I shut myself up in the amphitheatre, closing its strong double shutter. Then I took my usual position at the window, inhaling the fresh breeze of the evening, and thinking over the horrible drama in which I had been an involuntary participant, till night came on. Some hours had passed thus, and all was buried in the deepest silence, when I heard steps descending the staircase. They were followed by a knock at the door. No answer. A febrile hand then sought for the keyhole.

"It is Castagnac," I said to myself.

"Open!" exclaimed a voice from without. I was not deceived—it was Castagnac. He redoubled his efforts to shake the door from its hinges. I moved not, scarcely breathed. Another and a more violent effort was then made, but with the same want of success. Something then fell on the ground, and the footsteps receded. I had escaped assassination.

But what would become of him? Once more, as if by instinct, I took up my position at the window. I had not waited long when I saw the shadow of Castagnac advancing along the foot of the wall. The hardened criminal stopped some time to look up at my window, and seeing nothing, moved on slowly with his back to the rampart. He had got over half the distance when I cast the shout of death at him:

"Raymond, where are you going?"

But whether he was prepared for whatever happened, or that he had more hardihood than his victim, he did not move, but answered me with ironic laughter:

"Ah, ah! you are there, Doctor; I thought so. Stop a moment, I will come back; we have a little matter to arrange together."

Then lighting my torch, and raising it over the precipice:

"It is too late," I said; "look, wretch, there is your grave!"

And the vast steps of the abyss, with their blue shining rocks, were illuminated down to the depth of the valley. It was so terrible a vision that I involuntarily started back—with horror at the scene. What must it have been to him who was only separated from it by the width of a brick! His hands began to tremble, his head sought to cling to something on the ground.

"Mercy!" exclaimed the assassin, in a hoarse voice, "have mercy—mercy!"

I had no heart to pronounce his punishment. I cast his torch into the abyss, and left the room quickly, balancing its flame to and fro in the darkness, lighting up rock and shrub as it rose, and casting spasms on the cold ground. It had already become but a luminous point in the abyss, when a shadow passed by it with the rapidity of lightning.

I then knew that justice had been done.

As I reascended in my own room my foot struck against something. I picked it up; it was my sword: Castagnac, with characteristic perfidy, had resolved to kill me with my own sword, so as to leave an appearance behind of suicide. I found, as I had anticipated, my room in utter disorder; the door had been broken open, my books and papers ransacked, and the whole dwelling smashed. Such an act completely dissipated whatever involuntary pity I might have felt for the fate of such a wretch.

ABOUT "LITTLE THINGS."

OH, it really is such a trifle it can not possibly make any difference! A little thing like that can do no harm. Any dog soon will be time enough to look at that to-night. It is so small that really it is of no consequence. These are some of the excuses for not attending to little things.

Nearly all great things spring from little ones. That is, as I used to learn at school, an axiom, something self-evident. A big man is a very small boy of course, and so a pig, for all people weighing twenty score, at first is a very little squealer. I was at a dinner party once when a gentleman asked, if I remember right, what we supposed his wife, whom I had taken in to dinner, to have been, when he married her, a small person.

"My dear," said the lady, "small, indeed, people often have large ends."

"So they have, Sir," he said; "she was small once, now she is nearer eighteen."

The other day a gentleman was purchasing a stocking; she was one of that class who do mend stockings. I stood watching her—it is curious to do so—to watch persons doing things you never did, and never could learn to do yourself. There was but a very small hole, and fortunately no great strain in such matters, I asked why she mended so small a hole: why she did not leave it till the hole was at least much larger, and then have a good bit at once. She looked at me just as if she thought I was a simpleton. And so I was. "Don't ever do that," the small hole is minded, "for as you will not come," I stood reproved. I have since learned that the stitches in a stocking goes it can be at once put right and will last a long time: but that if it be neglected, the one stitch gone will soon become a large hole, and baffle all the mending power of the household.

It was not long ago that a large tract of reclaimed land was shining in the fairest richness and beauty which good farming and rich crops can give. A large sluice-gate kept out and regulated the once triumphant waters, and all was safe and secure. In one short hour, this beautiful extent of land was covered with the once more triumphant waters, acres and acres immediately destroyed, and years of many a hard-working agriculturist brought to the verge of ruin. The embankment had given way, the sluice-gate washed from its bearings, and the water again, with a mighty roar, as if exulting over man's conquest, rushed over its old possessions. It couldn't be helped. It was no one's fault. Who would have thought it? Such, probably, were the words used to cover the misfortune. But it is a true some one, perhaps several persons, had seen a few days before that there was a little stream of water that was undermining the foundation of a few of the sluice. But what of that? That was only a trifle, quite a little thing; no one would have thought of that; and yet what were the consequences? Those who saw what eventually led, and who had been accustomed to look at little things, known would be sure to lead to such a dire catastrophe, what was really but the beginning of the end, would have thought it a very big thing. But those to whom they told their tale would but have echoed back the stereotyped observation, "Little things are not worth our notice," or words to that effect, and would have given no more thought to the subject till the final blow came.

A flaw in a boiler plate under the fire is not much, but it will lead to the loss of a finger. A bit of skin scraped off the finger is but a little thing, but it is lingering and fearful death. How many a bad leg arises from a little wound that was not attended to in the beginning! How many a bad fall, that is, a fall that ends in a horse's hoof will often in a few days ruin the most valuable animal, and a nail driven awkwardly into the shoe has been the fall. A new loose has spent an entire train; and many a valuable life has been lost by only such a little thing as a nail driven awry. One single stone may first laid the foundation of these vast Pacific works. If, then, hundreds and thousands of years ago, we have the industrious little builder at work, should we have imagined, should we have believed that so little a thing could have reared so great a heap? The vast banyan grove is sprung from one small plant. But a few years ago It was not enough to wash off the sun from one man, and now it affords shelter to thousands of birds and beasts, hiding in its branches the gentle dove or the poisonous serpent. Truly great things have little beginnings, and small words oftentimes lead to great actions.

THE DOVE IN HER NEST.

BY MILES O'REILLY.

"NAY, your wine will make me heady,
We have ta'en enough already;
Let us go while we are steady;
Do not stir, I know my way."
So I lit my chamber candle,
Sought my room and turned the handle—
Lady togs, from ruff to sandal,
Loose across the lounger lay!

"Heavens!" I cried, alarmed and shaken,
"Surely I have mistaken!
If the sleeping beauty waken,
What excuse for me remains?
Fear the daughters my chaperone,
Love with eager step advances—
Oh, the langnors and the trances!
Oh, the pleasures and the pains!

Blissful watch above her keeping,
Angels guard their sleeping—
Would they wake her should, a-peeping,
Bearded mortal ope the door?
Stealthily a pace advancing,
Round the rose-silk draperies glancing—
Oh, the sight divine, entrancing,
Haunts my dreams for evermore!

Flushed as May's young wealth of roses,
Lnurs on the couch reposes,
And the drifted snow discloses
Outlines wavy and remote;
Tresses loose—a golden wonder;
Crimson lips that mock asunder,
And one small hand creeping under
The crisp lace which fringed her throat.

Now a kiss were easy stealing,
But I dared not trust the feeling,
For my will had wandered reeling
In the fullness of her view;
So I bowed my head and blessed her,
Prayed the angels watch to rest her,
Softly said, "Sweet dreams, fair sister!"
And from that small heaven withdrew.

QUITE ALONE.

CHAPTER LII.

STILL IN LUCK'S WAY.

LILY scarcely knew what to make of the new humor of her tyrant. The woman's avowal that she was her mother, and her claim upon her for a daughter's obedience, came upon the poor girl so suddenly and unexpectedly, that she was quite dazed and stupefied by the vague soundings thoughts which chased each other through her brain, leaving no fixed or definite impression behind. Why had she so long feels. Yen Lily to regard her as her mother—dared he. to call her by that name? Why did she make the avowal now, and claim, on the score of filial duty, that obedience which she had hitherto enforced by the terror of dreadful words and savage threats? What did she mean by spanking so savagely, and with so much significant emphasis, of Lily as her "legs?" And then those terrible words about her father! As Lily sat in her mother's dressing-room at the circus, trying to beguile the time with some purposeless piece of embroidery, these distracting thoughts crowded upon her palpitating brain, and filled her troubled soul with a nameless terror.

She had had an impulse once or twice during the afternoon to throw herself into her mother's arms, and to be allowed to love her; but each time when she was on the point of doing so she was repelled by a cold look or a harsh word. Perhaps it lately heart was reserved for something to love, so longed for some one to return the affection which welled over and ran to waste in her own desolate breast, that she could have loved even this cold, remorseless woman. Many and many a time when she was Quite Alone, in her little bed at the Pension, Marcassin, she had tried to realize to herself what it was to have a mother and a mamma. The other girls talked about their papas and mammas, and bragged about them; how rich their papas were, how handsome their mammas were, what treats their papas and mammas gave them when they went home for the holidays.

But Lily had no papa; none, at least, whom she knew; no mamma, except the harsh, cruel woman who had brought her there, and left her among strangers, without a kiss or a kind word. And she was at times even doubtful about this woman. Was she none of a mother's feelings, nothing of a mother's love. Marygold had told her the story of the babes in the wood, and of the cruel uncle who deserted them and left them to die in the pathless forest. Perhaps this woman, who did her, and railed at her, and dragged her along so roughly, was a cruel uncle, who sought to lose her, and leave her to die in that strange city. And at such times, with such sad thoughts throbbing in her bewildered brain, the lonely child would hide her head under the bedclothes, and shed bitter tears. She had been often told that she was bad and obstinate and wicked. And though she did not feel herself a bad wicked girl, and tried to be good, she came to believe that what the woman and Madame Marcassin said of her must be true, and that it was because she was a bad wicked girl that she had no papa and mamma like the other girls. Many a night, long after her companions had gone to sleep, she had been repeating her prayers over and over again, asking God to make her good and give her a kind papa and mamma; and, wearied out at last, she would fall into a pleasant slumber, and dream of the few kind faces that she had seen and known, and hear again the few voices that had spoken to her gently and kindly.

But now she had awakened from all her dreams and all her hopes. Her father, she had just been told, was a cheat, a scoundrel, and a beggar: and her mother was the unfeeling, calculating cruel woman who had made her life a hell. Lily, who was at that moment performing for the amusement of a gaping crowd in the circus at Ranelagh. Poor Lily had but one refuge from the dark despair of the situation in which she found herself, and that was in thoughts of Edgar. They had met once again. He had seen her, and in that one moment, before she fainted, Lily saw that he recognized her. She fondly hoped that the sudden flush that came over his face fetokened pleasure, and her yearning heart beat with a trembling joy at the thought. But sadness fell upon her again when she reflected that she was the daughter of a circus-rider, and he a rich, high-born gentleman. Oh, if they were only the lady and his equal!

Lily was startled from these distracting reflections by a gentle knock at the dressing-room door.

"Who is there?" she asked.

The door was opened gently, and a voice in the passage said, timidly, "It's only I, my dear."

It was the voice of the waiter.

"Come in, Mr. Kafooze," said Lily; "there is no one here but I. I am quite alone."

"Yes, my dear," said the waiter, "I knew that you were yo'yourself. I wouldn't have ventured if your ma—if Madame Ernestine—had been here. You don't like me, my dear, do you?—I said something to her to-day, you know, when she came back for the whip. I was rather lucky to go fole for things that way, my dear, and I couldn't help saying it. She's a very excoriating young woman, I'm sorry to say, but she would have horsewhipped me."

"Won't you come in, Mr. Kafooze, and sit down a little?" said Lily, for the satrologer was still lingering in the passage.

"No, my dear, thank you," said Mr. Kafooze; "Madame Ernestine has told me that I mustn't shouldn't like to fall in her way. I am afraid, my dear, she hasn't a very good temper. Some people can't help it; it's all owing to their stars, and folks can't help their stars, you know."

"Did you want to say any thing particular to me, Mr. Kafooze?" Lily asked.

"Yes, my dear, just one word. You said you didn't know what star your mother was born under?"

"No, I don't know at all, Mr. Kafooze, or I should be very happy to tell you."

"I'm sure you would, my dear, I'm sure you would," said Mr. Kafooze. "It's a pity you don't know, because I could be able to tell you something about the future."

"Can you read the future, and tell what's going to happen?" said the child.

"Yes, my dear; I've been very correct on many occasions, I assure you. I make all the calculations for a prophecy almanack that sells by hundreds of thousands; but I never feel the credit of it, nor the profit of it either. Poor broken-down man, you know, my dear. People laugh and say the things are put down at random, just what comes first; but they don't. Every thing goes by rule. I can assure you, my dear, that when the almanac's in hand—and one is in some of the houses—I never go out. I sit up night after night with the stars, and watch them, and read them until they go out in the dawn, and you should see my study when a sheet of paper that I cover with figures. It costs me something for paper, I can tell you, and if it wasn't for the books Mr. M'Variety sends me and the old copy-books, I'm sure I don't know what I should do. Ah, it's hard work reading the stars, when you read them in earnest, my dear. And there's no doing any thing with them unless you study them well. I've got a list of my predictions filled with the aspects of the stars at the time. Here's what I predicted in my almanac for 1845: 'February. Mars is in Taurus, so that this month there will be wars, and rumors of wars, and rebellions;' which you will see, my dear, by the Morning Herald, was the case. In the month of the following year, was borne out to the letter. Here's the paragraph. It says: 'Yesterday the usually quiet town of Marlborough was the scene of great disturbance, owing to a quarrel among the navvies engaged on the railway. The navvies fought for some time with spades and sticks, and several of them were severely wounded. The tumult, however, was speedily put down by the police.' And there's another one more remarkable one. For the 16th of March I said: 'The opposition of Saturn to Mars denotes the death of a great warrior.' Ah, I, as I said, on the 16th of April of the following ay year, the Times announced the death of General Colcoco. Bolderby, of the Somersershire militia. One of my predictions was fulfilled to the very day. The aspect of Neptune, my dear, enabled me to predict that there would be disaster at sea on the 13th of September, and on that very day, at one o'clock, a boy was drowned in the Serpentine in Southend. Ah, the stars never deceive you when you study them well. Do you know what star you were born under, my dear?"

"No, Mr. Kafooze," Lily said; "I have not the faintest idea."

"I should like to know very much," said Mr. Kafooze; "and also your ma's. I think your ma's star must have been Saturn. I don't say it with any disrespect to your ma, my dear, but Saturn is a bad star to be born under. The aspects said that he ate his children."

It flitted across Lily's mind that her ma's star was most probably Saturn.

"You can't tell me the date of your birth, can you?" Mr. Kafooze asked.

"I don't think I can, exactly, Mr. Kafooze," Lily answered. "I used to have a birthday, but it was long ago at school. I think it was in November—the last day of November."

"And how old are you now, my dear?"

"It may seem a strange thing to say, Mr. Kafooze," Lily answered, "but I don't exactly know. I—I think I am nineteen."

"Nineteen!" said Mr. Kafooze, "and the last day of November. Let me see, that will take us back to the year—. But bless me, there's your ma just come off, and I wouldn't have her catch me here for the world. Good-by, my dear, for the present. You'll see me again soon, when I have been studying to tell you about the future."

And Mr. Kafooze closed the door, and shuffled away in the dark to get out of the countess's way. Poor soul! he was thoroughly in earnest about his stars, and really worked hard at that almanac which he brought to the proprietor and publisher many hundreds a year, but yielded old Kafooze only a few miserable pounds. Yet if it had yielded him nothing, he would have taken the same pains, for he loved his work, and believed in it. And he was how the poor old man never could earn more than his two pounds ten a week: he trusted in man, and believed in the stars.

Madame Ernestine came off from her exposition of the high school of horsemanship in great good humor. She was more radiant with satisfaction. M'Variety had brought to her more good news.

"I am going to give you a benefit, countess, on the last night of the season."

The countess looked surprised at first, for she had had some experience of benefits. There were benefits and no benefits. M'Variety interpreted her dubious look at once, and hastened to assure her.

"Oh, don't be afraid; it's not that sort; the real thing, and you'll get a share of the receipts, and no expenses. Come to my room after your performance and I'll tell you all about it."

It was very necessary for Mr. M'Variety to inform the countess that it was not "that sort." "That sort" was a benefit which M'Variety completed all his people to take. It was written down in the bond; so much a week and a benefit. But why should compulsion ever be necessary in such a case? Who ever heard of a person refusing to take money when it is honestly offered to him, and he has nothing to do but hold out his hand for it? Well, the fact is, the benefits which M'Variety so liberally insisted upon all his dependants being, were not benefits for them, but for himself. It was an understood thing that each member of the staff should allow his name to be put down for a benefit, and that the nominal beneficiare should use all his influence to secure a good attendance.

Beyond that there was no interest in it. The manager took the money. The outside public would probably regard a transaction of this kind as mean and shabby; but the idea of its being any thing but a matter of course never entered Mr. M'Variety's head, or even the heads of his company. It was a usage of the profession, sanctified by time and custom. It is wonderful how such usages preserve the so-called profession to its topmost branches and its deepest roots. In the theatrical body politic every body gets something out of every body, by some quiet sub rosa arrangement which never appears above board. You have seen poor, wretched, broken-down men in the streets carrying advertisement boards, sandwich fashion. Sharp misery has worn them to the bone; their clothes are more rags. Of misery's hunger is in their looks, pals, is in their limbs. They crawl along with bent bodies and downcast eyes, as if they were seeking some hole to creep to down and die, and some out-of-the-way dust-heap on which to shoot their mortal rubbish. You doubt if such poor, dilapidated, degraded tenements can possibly lodge immortal souls. Yet even these burlesques of humanity have a use in the pervading usage, which begins with the leading tragedian and the prima donna. They are down in the manager's books for a certain day; but there is a middleman who takes the contract, and gives them impudence.

When Madame Ernestine dismounted from her trained steed Constant she hastened to the manager's room.

"Now, monsieur M'Variety, about this benefit; dites-moi, I am dying to know."

"Well, countess, I mean to do the thing handsome."

"Half the receipts of the circus, eh?"

"Would you like that, countess?" Mr. M'Variety asked. "The circus will hold fifty pounds; the half of that is twenty-five."

"Oh! it would be very fine; but it is much for ou—for a manager o give without being asked."

Madame Ernestine had not a high opinion of managers; she believed that even their virtues leaned to vice's side.

"What do you think, then," said M'Variety, with a sly twinkle in his eye, "if I were to give you the whole receipts of the circus?"

"You should be a duke, I should think, Monsieur Mac, that you were un bon enfant, the prince of managers, one who is all heart—an ange—and nothing besides."

She paused, and added the last words slowly and significantly.

"And what besides?" the manager asked.

"Why, Monsieur Mac, I should think besides all this that you had your reasons. Ha!"

"Well, well," said Mr. M'Variety, waving off his little attempt to assume the character of a generous benefactor, "that's nothing to you, you know. You shall have the benefit, and, if you make good use of your swell friends, I don't see why you shouldn't net a hundred pounds by it."

"A hundred pounds! Ah! that is something!" cried the countess; and her eyes glistened, as if she had seen the money lying before her in bright golden sovereigns.

"And mind," said M'Variety, "I shan't charge you a farthing for expenses."

The manager made a merit of this, and the countess was good enough to recognize it.

"Believe me, Monsieur Mac," she said, "I appreciate your generosity; you will, on this occasion, kindly refrain from helping yourself to a share of that which does not belong to you. That is a merit in a directeur, and I give you credit for it. I could embrace you."

M'Variety was grateful for this evidence of good feeling, but he was a little alarmed at the hint of an embrace. He would sooner have been embraced by a boa constrictor or a Bengal tiger.

"Well, then," he said, "consider every thing arranged."

"Fort bien," said the countess; "and the day?"

"This day week," said the manager; "the last night of the season—Friday."

CHAPTER LIII.

THE LITTLE BIRD.

No woman, however sensible her disposition, or however loving her nature, could have entertained a sentiment of affection for Francis Blunt, once she came to know him and fathom the depths of his base and worthless character. Francis Blunt married Mademoiselle Valérie, a very beautiful, unscrupulous, pleasure-loving actress of the Paris theatres. Estrangement and separation were inevitable. Blunt, like many other wise men, had an ambition to marry an actress, and he married one. Mademoiselle Valérie had an ambition to marry a rich English traveler who would keep her in luxury and splendor, and she married the man who seemed to fulfill her desires. He had been completely deceived. Sitting in his box and gazing at her in her paint and smiles on the stage, Blunt thought Valérie an angel. Sitting by his fireside, linked to her by the bonds of holy matrimony—save the mark!—and gazing at her without her paint and her smiles, he found her a devil. Meeting Blunt behind the scenes and at gay supper parties, where he spent his money like water, and was lionized and addressed as Milord, Valérie regarded the Englishman as a person of boundless wealth. Living with him in the same house, knowing all his concerns, encountering his dons, and witnessing all the mean shifts to which he was occasionally driven, she speedily learned the bitter, sad, but undeniable truth, that she had married a spendthrift, a rosé, an adventurer, a beggar.

To Blunt, the discovery that his wife was a selfish, cold-hearted, unbearable woman, was a terrible one. It disappointed him in nothing more. He was not sanguine; moral scruples never troubled him; he was perfectly indifferent to the opinion of the world. He wanted a fortune from her, give her a maintenance—or promise her one—and return to his old, gay, reckless life.

But Valérie's position was different. Had she been the best woman that ever breathed she could not have smothered the contempt for the heartless coxcomb who had so bitterly deceived her, and afterward so cruelly used her. Had Valérie been not a good woman, she was a female harpy, whose whole aim and ambition were to be richly adorned, to have plenty of money, and to live in a constant round of pleasures. Such being her character, she did not merely despise Blunt, she hated him with all the fierceness and malignity of a fiend. And her loathing hatred of him culminated and came to its climax when just at the time when a true woman's nature becomes most softened, most tender, most capable of trust and love and forgiveness.

The time of her fiercest and most implacable hatred of her husband was when she first heard the cry of the little new-born baby. That news been a new bond of union. It was the cause of irreconcilable and implacable hate. That unnatural—but, alas! not rare—gulf called for whose lacquered magnificence she had fallen down—fallen down, too, from the lifted up to the coveted pinnacle of splendor and gayety and pleasure, but to be ruthlessly trodden over, debased, degraded, supreme in the foot of mammon—this man, her husband, had robbed her of the sunshine of her youth, cheated her of her golden opportunity, declared the best years of her days, and at length cast her from him, leaving her with the consciousness—to her a hateful one—of being the mother, also, of his child.

This terrible Frenchwoman was impenetrable; her heart—if she had a heart—was a fortress of implacability. She was so cold, so indurated in her hate, so fierce in her desire of revenge, that one might have suspected her of being literally possessed by a devil. She hated Lily, the child, because she was the child of the man who had deceived her, ill-used her, and disappointed her of her selfish expectations; she hated Lily, the girl, because while she promised to be an instrument of vengeance in her hands, she was yet a burden and a stone in her breast of steel, but because she was making some profit out of the girl, and saw a prospect of making still more. She relented toward her as a brute of a coster-monger will relent toward the ass that bears his burden, and earns for him his meat and drink and his night's lodging.

After her interview with Mr. M'Variety the countess was quite pleasant to the girl, after a fashion. Lily had never known her speak so kindly before. Poor Lily! She was thankful for very small mercies in the way of kindness. She was grateful for the received crumbs. The countess returned to her dressing-room with a look of triumph in her face, singing a snatch of one of her favorite French songs.

"You perceive, mademoiselle, that I am gay this evening," she said, addressing Lily.

"Yes, ma—" Lily paused at the word, and the countess took her up short, slapping her riding-habit with her whip.

"Yes, madam,' you were about to say. I did not tell you that you were to call me madame; ah! then you were to regard me as such, and obey me as such. I hate the word. You rejoice that I am gone—is not so, my?"

"Yes, I am glad that you are gay," Lily replied.

"Bien," said the countess, "that is dutiful; and you shall be rewarded; you shall sit up with me to supper in my new chateau. Quick! Assist me to undress."

This was the kindness for which Lily was so grateful.

The countess submitted herself to the hands of her fille-de-chambre without indulging in the usual exhibitions of temper, and when she was dressed, instead of going Lily-ward to her side, and talking to her on her way through the gardens to the cottage,

"We shall live here," she said, "until the commencement of the summer season, as Monsieur le Baronet prefers it; and in the meantime I shall teach you to ride. You know nothing, you are ignorant, useless. I work for my living; why should you live for yours? Ah! you pout now. By-and-by, when I am old and can no longer give an exposition of the haute-école, you will show your talents for all I have done for you by working for me. Will you not? Répondez-moi donc!"

"I will do anything you ask me," Lily replied. But she shuddered at the idea of becoming a horse-rider.

"Très bien!" said the countess, "you are still dutiful, so you shall sup with me. Allons! Entrez!"

There was more good news for the countess another pleasant surprise.

A servant followed with a large hamper containing an elegant supper and several bottles of wine. Mrs. Snuffburn was at the foot of the stairs in a high state of excitement with the intelligence.

"Who was the person who brought this—what you call—hampire? Is she countess's maid?"

"It was brought by a livery-servant, mum," said the housekeeper; "but he didn't leave no message, except that it was for Madame Ernestine."

"Did he not say who sent it?"

"No, mum. I asked him if there was compliments with it, and he only grinned, which he had top-boots on, mum, and a cockade in his 'at, said as there wasn't no compliments with it, but there was half-a-dozen bottles of sparkling, which was better, he thought."

The countess opened the hamper, and her eyes gleamed with pleasure, not so much at the dainties which it contained, as at the thought of her rising fortunes, and the influences which she was once more exercising upon the very votaries of pleasure.

"No matter," she said; "it is an elegant petit souper, come whence it may, and I am hungry. Let it be laid à l'instant. And that corbeau, that cozy, that—that—that thing, you know what I look! Why, it runs luck—rains chateaux, beauties, peasants, Champagne. Ha! what have we here? Cognac! Bon! Bon! Now shall we see good thought; vous êtes un bon enfant, monsieur—you understand me—qui que vous soyez."

The supper was laid in the gilded apartment, and the countess and Lily sat down together. The countess drank drafts of every thing, descending even to patronize the Champagne, but poor Lily could scarcely taste a thing. The countess's declaration of her intention to make her a horse-rider had completely taken away her appetite, and she could not eat and talk also.

"Eat, child, mais mangez donc?" the countess said to her, almost fiercely, as she herself gnawed wolfishly at a fowl's leg.

"I have no appetite," Lily said, languidly. "I—I do not feel very well."

"No appetite!" cried the countess. "I understand; no appetite—ha! ha! You will recover from that malady. Ma foi! when you come to be one you will have an appetite."

And she went on eating with her fingers, and gnawing the bones, and almost snarling over them.

"If you can not eat, perhaps you can drink. There, take some champagne. I will not grudge it you. It cost me nothing."

She poured—or flung rather—the bright bubbling wine into a tumbler and handed it across to the girl. Lily put the glass to her lips timidly, and sipped at its sparkling contents.

"Drink it up—videz le vere," cried the countess, angrily. "I have no patience with such mincing pretenses. Drink, I say!"

Lily, clutching the glass desperately, drank its contents to the last drop in sheer despair, as she would have drunk poison.

"Now, you may go; va-t'en—there is your room. It was intended for me; but I have given it up to you. You see how I love you—what a good mother I am." And she grinned horribly.

Lily was only too glad to obey. She was always thankful when bedtime came, that she might seek refuge from her sorrows in the forgetfulness of a night's sleep, or in the solace of a pleasant dream. She took a little candle that had been placed on the side-table for her, and retired to the dainty white chamber; but she was too weary, too eager to shut her eyes and bury her head, to do more than bestow a languid glance upon its tasteful furniture and neat appointments. She had eaten scarcely any thing, and the Champagne which her mother had forced her to drink made her heavy and drowsy. She put out her light, and undressed and crept to bed in the dark. She began to say her prayers—she never omitted them, though she might have done so, for she knew there was no one in heaven for her, so often had she repeated them and yet no deliverance—she began her prayers, but her eyelids closed upon them; when she was worn out with her dragging-chain of misery, she lost herself among the words, and fell asleep unconsciously.

How long she had been asleep she knew not, but she was suddenly aroused by a great gleam of light streaming through the crevices of her door. She thought for a moment that the Cottage was on fire, and was about to scream and call for help, when she heard her mother's voice. She was singing

Gai, gai, gai,
Le tambour bat aux champs de bataille.

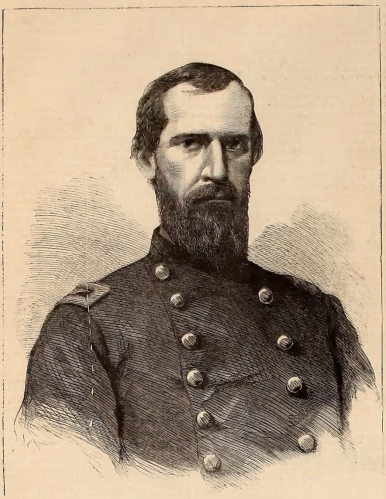
Lily listened, and heard her mother mixing up the names of Madame Ernestine, and Sir William Lovell, and the Marquis Greyfaunt—le Marquis Greyfond, as she called him—in a succession of nonsense words, which she sang to the same chorus. Anon, she broke into another strain—French dithyrambics which need not be repeated. They were about love, and bagatelle, and cognac.

The light seemed to be growing stronger and more intense, and the singing and words were beginning fast. Lily rose from her bed and crept to the door, which she had neglected to close. It stood slightly ajar, and the light streamed looked through the opening.

The countess, her mother, was sitting in the gilded arm-chair, her feet resting upon the gilt eagle which formed a foot-stool, holding a glass in her hand, and singing. The wax candle, whose burner in the great chandelier designed for halls of dazzling light, and, in the midst of the glisting and brass and lacquer of the Cottage of Gaud, strolled forth her reckless French songs. Lily was relieved to find that the house was not on fire, as she at first feared, but she was compressibly shocked to see her mother in that dreadful state. Her first impulse was to retire, and once more hide herself under the bed clothes; but she felt herself rooted to the spot as if by a fascination. She remained gazing at the extraordinary scene about her, and, anon, Lily felt an unsteady step approached the door of her chamber.

Lily retreated immediately, crept into bed, and feigned to be asleep.

The next instant the countess entered and approached the bed. She held the candle above, and looked down upon the face of the girl, seemingly wrapped in sleep. Lily felt the light from the chandelier, and the candle was extinguished, and strong upon her closed eyes, and through her eyelashes she could see her mother looking down upon her face. She could see the candle that terrified her—terrified her only for a moment. When the thought suddenly flashed through her that the Wild Woman had come to murder her, she resigned herself, and closed her eyes firmly, and waited with



THE LATE COLONEL ALEXANDER GARDINER.

THE LATE COLONEL GARDINER.

COLONEL ALEXANDER GARDINER, of the Fourteenth New Hampshire Volunteers, whose portrait is engraved on this page, was a native of New York City. Shortly after being admitted to the bar he removed to Kansas, then in her darkest hours of trouble, taking with him a printing-press and materials for the establishment of a Free-State paper. But Lawrence was sacked and his press utterly destroyed before the issue of the first number of the paper. Colonel GARDINER did not practice law in Kansas, as he refused to take oath under the pro-slavery Constitution. Having seen Kansas substantially through her troubles, Colonel GARDINER removed to New Hampshire, and soon took a commanding position in his profession. He volunteered in the Fourteenth New Hampshire Volunteers, and was appointed Adjutant. After seeing service in Virginia the regiment went to New Orleans, when it was attached to the Nineteenth Corps, with which it returned to take part in the final struggle in Virginia. Adjutant GARDINER had been promoted to the command of the regiment, and was killed at its head while leading his men to the charge at the victorious battle of Winchester. The army may have lost more prominent officers, but none braver, nobler, truer.

BEFORE PETERSBURG.

On this page, and on pages 712, 713, and 716, we give illustrations of General GRANT's Campaign. The adjoining cut represents a SIGNAL-STATION near General MEADE's head-quarters in front of Petersburg, and overlooking the roads to the rebel lines on our left and to the lead mines.

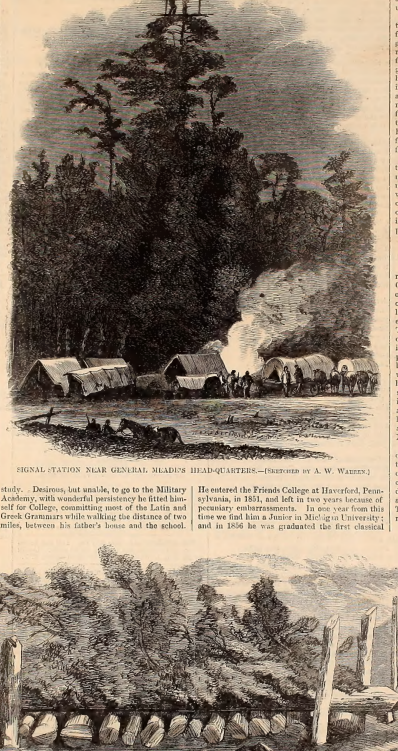
Below is a representation of a BOMB-PROOF RIFLE-PIT in front of the Second Corps. In the absence of active military operations the soldiers elaborately intrench themselves in works like the one here represented.

On page 716 is an illustration of a federal Fort on General MEADE's extreme left, and built in the vicinity of the ruins of the rebel Colonel PEGRAM's late residence.

The illustrations given on pages 712 and 713 relate to the work going on at the Dutch Gap Canal, east of Petersburg, and to the military roads constructed by General GRANT for the use of his army.

The Canal at Dutch Gap is within General BUTLER's lines. Its object is to cut off a long bend which the James River makes around Farrar's Island, and enable our fleet to take part in the operations against Richmond. It is hoped that the canal may be more efficient than that by which it was intended to make Vicksburg an inland city, giving the Mississippi a new course. The surrender of Island No. 10, in 1862, was undoubtedly hastened by the canal which General HALLECK built, and by which he effected a passage to the enemy's rear. This canal at Dutch Gap was begun in August, and is now nearly completed. Its completion the rebels expect to be followed by a formidable advance on Richmond.

Another sketch gives a view of the United States Military Railroad in front of Petersburg. This railroad connects with GRANT's extreme left. A third sketch represents our soldiers building roads; and gives also a view of the Railroad from the Army to City Point. The railroad is built on the surface of the ground, and without grading. The sketch is characteristic of the country between the army and City Point.



SIGNAL-STATION NEAR GENERAL MEADE'S HEAD-QUARTERS.—[SKETCHED BY A. W. WARREN.]

THE LATE MAJOR JONES.

MAJOR JAMES P. JONES, the fighting Quaker, Seventh Regiment Maine Volunteers, whose portrait we give on page 716, was born at Chino, Maine, in May, 1835, and was killed at the battle of Crystal Springs, before the defenses of Washington, July 14, 1864. His father and mother, ELI and SYBIL JONES, are distinguished Quaker ministers, having as missionaries visited most of the United States and British Provinces, England, Ireland, France, Germany, Norway, Sweden, and Liberia in Africa. Taught in childhood the peace theories of BARCLAY and PENN, he passed the limits of his father's library, with an active and naturally martial mind, which found in ancient and modern battles for free dom and human rights more genial subjects for study. Desirous, but unable, to go to the Military Academy, with wonderful persistency he fitted himself for College, committing most of the Latin and Greek Grammars while walking the distance of two miles, between his father's house and the school. He entered the Friends College at Haverford, Pennsylvania, in 1851, and left in two years because of pecuniary embarrassments. In one year from this time we find him a Junior in Michigan University; and in 1856 he was graduated the first classical scholar in his class, and immediately elected Tutor of Ancient Languages both in his alma mater and at Haverford College. These positions he declined, and opened a family school, in which he continued until his duty to his country called him forth.

In August, 1861, he went into the service as Captain. This step was opposed by his family and friends, without in the least shaking his purpose to go. He was in nearly every battle of his glorious regiment, and, a comrade tells us, was always in front when duty called. He particularly distinguished himself at Antietam in a charge made by his regiment, again in the second battle of Fredericksburg, and lastly in the battle of the Wilderness and Spottsylvania; in the former of which engagements his regiment, with him at the head, was the first that stopped the panic in the Sixth Corps; in the latter he received a ball through his right arm. He came home, but in a few days returned to the front, having still no use of his arm, although his furlough continued three or four weeks longer.

Only a few days passed after his return before the sad tidings came that he was dead, accompanied by those few words to his friends: "I die for my country, and am willing to die. All is well with me. Tell my boy never to disgrace the name of his father." Thus fell, facing the foe in front of the Capital, with an imperishable record, a brilliant scholar, a brave soldier, and an unfaltering patriot.

UNION REFUGEES.

WE give on page 708 a sketch representing Union refugees coming into the Federal lines. Although General SHERMAN would not permit the residents of Atlanta to remain there, yet neither he nor any other of our generals has refused to receive into his lines those flying from the hard despotism and misery which have blighted the Southern Confederacy. These refugees, whether they come from Richmond or from the Southwest, are invariably provided for in every possible way, and are not in any case compelled to enter our armies. The number of these helpless ones must continually increase as the pressure of our conquering armies bears more and more heavily on the rebel strong-holds. The rebel conscription grows daily harder and more merciless in its provisions, and there are thousands of women and children who must inevitably be left without husband or brother or father to feed or defend them, and their only hope will be in escaping to the North.

The Sanitary and Christian Commissions with our armies in the field devote no small measure of their attention to these refugees, who have large claims on their charity and kindness. In many cases they have borne obloquy on account of their devotion to the old flag; and we should receive them as heroes who have served our glorious cause. There are in the South many such, of whom we must remember that "They also serve who only stand and wait."

BOMB-PROOF RIFLE-PIT IN FRONT OF PETERSBURG.—[SKETCHED BY A. W. WARREN.]

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE learned Professor Porson had a great horror of the east wind, and Tom Sheridan is said to have once kept him a prisoner in the house for a fortnight by fixing the weather-cock in that direction.

Slow newspapers are sometimes printed upon fast presses.

Policemen, although their general health is good, are much troubled with felons on their hands.

Which is the most powerful, the earth or the sea?—The sea, of course, it has such heaps of muscles.

"What are you about?" inquired a lunatic of a cook, who was leisurely picking the feathers from a fowl. "Dressing a chicken," answered the cook. "I should call that gardening," replied the crazy fellow. The cook looked reflective.

THE WISE DOG.—Help yourself and pass the bottle.

If you want to be hoaxed go into the wilds of Africa.

The following verse commemorates the not uncommon misfortune of a hungry urchin:

"There was a small boy of Pentwicket,
He bought him an orange to suck it;
He had a long nose,
And as you may suppose,
Into the orange he stuck it."

A SAYING was lately asked how trade was with him. He replied that it was "very bad—almost dying hardly." "Why, how's that?" asked the other. "Well, then sole," answered the sexton, "poverty seldom dies. There's far more left to bewail and eat-chisel-ing than is left to be buried."

An American old bachelor says ships are called "she" because they always keep a sea-on the look-out.

A sick dog isn't generally strengthened by a course of bark.

Time is money; of course it is, or how could you "spend an evening?"

Why is a pig the most extraordinary animal in creation?—Because you first kill and then cure him.

"Polly, my boy, can't you cut a little more?" "Well, perhaps I could if I tried, my mother."

According to the articles of war it is death to stop a cannon-ball.

Why is the letter a likely to prove dangerous in argument?—Because it turns words into swords!

Last Sunday little Ike, three years and a half old, went to church for the first time. His mother gave him a penny to put in the contribution box, which he did, and sat quiet for a few moments, and then wanted to know how soon the man was coming with the candy.

The man who makes a business of raising sock to market may be said to sire by his pen.

If you want to kindle the flame of love in a lady's breast you must spend your oil-like eagerly as a watch.

Why should a man with a strong gait-h be accounted a smart fellow?—Because he's a shrewd individual.

A "FEMALE DIFFICULTY"—A Frau.

An Irish member declared that, among other portraits, he has a picture-sque address, avoid asking her where she "hangs out."

Because every body's Redrop. If you wish to have your business address printed, avoid asking her where she "hangs out."

The telegrams that come via Philadelphia to New York are generally re-lied on.

It is stated that at a Newark debating society a wheelwright was by far the best spoken-man.

A burned child hates the fire, but a man who has been singed by Cupid's torch always has a smoking kindness for the old flame.

The girls are uniform-y attracted to dashing military men.

Why is a hive like a spectator at a show?—Because it is a bee-holder (beholder).

A MAN OF STRAW—Will-o'-the-wisp.

The minister who divides his sermon into seven heads finds it difficult to get attend-ance for all of them.

WELL MATCHED.—An intelligent farmer being asked if his horses were well matched, replied, "Yes, they are matched first-rate: one of them is willing to do all the work, and the other is willing he should."

Why is like a negro's mouth?—Because it abounds in gum and candy.

What entire in the alphabet resembles a man in laugh?—The letter w—for he's always waggy-sagging.

Why isn't a New York Company like a watch?—Because it does not go to make it's wheels go.

It took six days continuous labor to make the world, but to make it over again would only be a re-action.

A PERSON OF "TAKING MANNERS"—A thief.

He must be a strong general who can storm and carry a fortress.

WHY WE SHOULD be courageous in addressing his father's guns?—Because he is not particular to a shade.

"People may say what they will about country air being so good for health," said Mrs Partington, "and I'm sure I'm fat up to it; for my part, I think it is owing to the victuals. Air may be fat ammonia and other reptiles that live on it. But I know that men must have something more substantial."

A country gentleman, walking in his garden, saw his gardener taking to an arbor. "What!" says the master, "indeed, you idle dog, you are not worthy that the sun should shine on you." "I am only mindful of my old worldsmen," answered the man, "and therefore I laid myself down in the shade."

A young Hibernian friend of ours, who is desperately in love, says that he has been electrified with a gal-vanic battery

A despairing man tears his hair. An enraged woman is wont—also tears her husband's.

We once heard a woman of the world say, "The state of widowhood is inconvenient: for one must assume all the modesty of a young girl without being able to feign her ignorance."

When may a cheese be said to resemble majesty?—When it is high and mighty.

IN THE WILDERNESS

ALL day long the battle raged,
With clang of guns and bugle's breath,
In the tangled swamps of the Wilderness,
Through dusky thickets dim with death.
All day the fierce tide surged and swung,
With crash and shriek and cannon's tone,
While far along the glimmering lines
Proudly our golden eagles shone.

The rifle-pits swarmed black with men,
And like the sheeted August rain,
A singing storm of iron hail
Beat on our steadfast line in vain.
And up the mid-May's blinding blue,
That deep reflects the gleaming deeds
With the great calm of God, the shells
Made trailing, long-drawn arcs of fire.

Our batteries crowned the slanting ridge—
The trees within the woods for space
Slave here and there a random shot,
From brazen lips no answer came.
And grim with smoke and powder-stain
The strong-limbed, dusty cannoniers
Leaned, eager, on their idle guns,
And heard their distant comrades' cheers.

Far to the rear the sandy road
Ran northward to the distant town;
No battle-clamor stirred the air,
And like a picture the purple-line crown
Of beauty, song, and blossom's flush.
While young leaves made a tender gloom
Here rustled sassafras and birch
Were whitened with the clover's bloom.

Under a brown-stemmed chestnut-tree,
That made a green tent overhead,
A young boy, on the cool, soft grass,
Stretched shattered limbs that a-bed and bled;
Full young to wear a soldier's blue,
And share a patriot's toils and fears,
Yet strong in that large growth of soul
That comes not with the added years.

And as he lay in helpless pain,
His marching days forever done,
He reached a feeble hand and plucked
The violets dreaming in the sun,
Meekly, in blue-eyed innocence,
And at their fragrance in his heart
A mist of memories rose, that made
Quick tears to start and drop apart.

The low swell of New England hills—
The old home-farm—the orchard, fair
With wreaths of tinted apple-blooms,
And, yet beyond, the meadow where
He found the first spring violets
In happy, boyish days long-gone,
But unforgot, even through the last
That's theyr trumped had been blown.

His gray-haired mother, on her knee:
Prayed, the dear God might and day
For him, her boy, "her only one"—
God bless and keep him safe alway!
A thought of home and mother-love,
And through the mid-May's balmy calm
A great peace folded softly down,
Like the low music of a psalm,

On his tired heart in infinite rest;
And content with all the divine
Of happy Nature's sweet, blind trust,
He saw Faith's golden promise shine,
Thru Pie who made them simple, for-ets
To blossom in the Wilderness
World look upon His helpless cold
With eyes of pitying tenderness.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

PINEAPPLE CIDER,

Is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS.—The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent disease. The active effects of the Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young, is to keep the body in a healthy condition one year. Price $1 00. One quart bottle will last a well person one year. Full directions for taking and doctor's instructions in each bottle. Dr. Talbot's Office, 24 Bond St., but letter to pay three cents a year to keep from being sick than to pay ten, or twenty dollars in doctor bill, and so much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of sickness. The previous sickness can be followed. Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a bottle of water, and it will drink like the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the appetite, and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has since died, was a friend of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month, of the Pineapple. He continues to use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire exclusive medicine in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for two years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $1 per bottle (full quart). Sent free by express on receipt of price.

Brandreth's Pills.

The weak, the Consumptive, Rheumatic, Costive, Bilious, and Delicate, after some days' use, will find renewed strength and life pervade every organ of their frames Every day makes the blood purer. The nerves soon commence in the arteries and terminate in the veins. These pills, as a first effect, act upon the arterial blood, increasing its circulation, which impurities are deposited in the veins, and they throw off such collections into the bowels, which organs, by the energy derived from Brandreth's Pills, expel them from the system. When first used, the Pills may occasion griping, and even make the patient feel worse. This is an excellent sign, and shows the disease will soon be cured. No great good is often achieved without some trouble in its attainment, and this rule applies to the recovery of health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH'S name in white letters.

J. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

IMPETUOUS CHARGE OF THE FIRST COLORED REBEL REGIMENT.

[By our Prophetic Artist.]

"The time has come for us to put into the army every able-bodied negro man as a soldier. We have learned from dear-bought experience that negroes can be taught to fight. I would free all able to bear arms, and put them into the field at once. They will make much better soldiers with no fears against us, and swell the now depleted ranks of our armies."—HENRY W. ALLEN (Rebel Governor of Louisiana) to JAMES W. SEDDON (Rebel Secretary of War), September 28, 1864.

"The Conscription of Negroes should be accompanied with freedom and the privilege of remaining in the State. When it is once understood that freedom and a home in the South are the privileges offered by the Confederate Authorities, not only will deserters from our ranks be undaunted, but the stalwart negroes of the Yankee fatherland will exchange services. Nor should this important subject be prejudiced with questions about putting negroes on an equality with our friends, brothers, and forefathers."—Richmond Enquirer, October 18.

Derives much of its popularity from the well-founded claim to use, which gives it a peculiar value in a family. The varying diseases which may be benefited by it, and in their incipient stages eradicated, are among those which are peculiarly fatal if suffered to run; but the curative magic of this preparation at once disarms them of their terrors. In all respects it fulfils the conditions of a popular medicine.

SHERIDAN'S VICTORY.

We give in the subjoined illustration a representation of the highly interesting ceremony in which General CUSTER officiated, on Sunday, October 23—namely, that of presenting to the Secretary of War the Battle-Flags captured from the Rebels in the Battle of Cedar Creek. General CUSTER arrived in Washington on the Saturday before the ceremony took place; and ten of the captured flags were displayed from the railroad engine as the train came in. During the presentation it was announced that General CUSTER had been appointed Major-General, and this fact occasioned great enthusiasm among the large crowd assembled to witness the ceremony. One of the colors captured was the head-quarters flag of the late rebel General RAMSEUR, bearing the inscription, "On to Victory! Presented by Mr. W. T. Sutherlin." A large number of the colors were taken by CUSTER'S Division. General RAMSEUR was a class-mate of General CUSTER'S at West Point, and as the former was dying the two reviewed together the reminiscences of their cadet life.

FORGING SOLDIERS' VOTES.

We give on page 725 a sketch showing the manner in which the Copperheads obtain their votes. The facts of the case, at its present development, are as follows: The first suspicion that something wrong was going on in regard to the soldiers' vote in this State occurred to Mr. ORVILLE K. WOOD, who was in the army procuring votes in behalf of the Union Committee of Clinton County. Proceeding thereupon to the agency of the State of New York at Baltimore, and gaining the confidence of a certain Mr. FERRY, the agent appointed by Governor SEYMOUR two years ago to look after sick and wounded soldiers in and around Baltimore, he found his suspicions more than confirmed. Mr. FERRY remarked to Mr. WOOD that when Union votes came to that office "they went out all right." In Mr. WOOD'S presence this Mr. FERRY and his fellow-agents, DONAHUE, NEWCOMB, and others, signed soldiers' names to votes, filling out the blanks with other names in regular order, all forged; altered Union votes, so that soldiers giving their suffrages to Mr. LINCOLN were made to vote for General MCCLELLAN; and affixed to Democratic ballots the names of sick and wounded, and even of dead soldiers. The conspirators admitted that a number of agents were employed in a similar manner, and that soldiers' votes were in this way manufactured by the dry-goods' box full. These statements are sworn to in court by two of those engaged in the fraud, and the exhibition of the documents, consisting of a number of the forged votes, and a large amount of correspondence, leaves no room for doubt as to the nature and extent of the crime which has been committed against our citizens at home, and against our brave soldiers in the field. There is nothing whatever to contradict or to soften this damning evidence of guilt. And it would appear from the testimony that even an officer in the army, a Commissary-General, had lent his aid and sanction to the crime. A list of the soldiers from Columbia County was sent to Dodsabre to help on the shameful forgery. The following letter, which was intercepted, shows to what use the list was put:

NEW YORK STATE AGENCY, BALTIMORE,
NO. 31 W. FAYETTE STREET, October 31, 1864.

MY DEAR SIR,—I send with this note a number of bottles for your county. I have needs at a number from the last you sent me.

I also send a package put up by Mr. FERRY, State Agent, and you will find a note from him explaining things. I guess you know best. Fearing that you might lose the inclose envelopes and powers of attorney sworn to; you can fill them up with friends or any other convenient.

You can fill them up as well in your county as we can here. If we have names of enlisted persons, ascertain them from the Supervisors' list of any county.

In haste, your friend, E. D., Jr.

You can procure large envelopes for attorneys' names at Albany. Put in some good names for attorneys.

Thousands of soldiers' votes have been forged, and many of them have been sent home. Every vote thus fraudulently given has deprived some soldier of his franchise, the most invaluable of his rights as an American citizen. Nor has this injury been confined to the living. The Copperheads have dared not simply to forge the votes of living soldiers, but even to desecrate our honored dead.

RIDING TO VOTE.

YONDER the bleak old Tavern stands—the faded sign before,
That years ago a setting sun and banded harvest bore:
The Tavern stands the same to-day—the sign you look for now
Has glintings of the dazzled sheaves, but nothing of the sun.

In Jackson's days a gay young man, with spirits hale and blithe,
And form like the young hickory, so tough and tall and lithe,
I first remarked smiling up—we came a wagon-load,
A dozen for OLD HICKORY—this rough November road.

Ah! thirty years—they help a man, you see, in growing;
They can not take the manly soul that makes a man alway!
It's thirty years, or near: to-day I go to vote once more;
Here, half a mile away, we see the crowd about the door.

My boys, in EIGHTEEN SIXTY—my boys? by my men, I mean!
(No better men nor braver souls in flesh-and-blood are seen)
One twenty-six, one twenty-three, rode with their father then;
The ballot-box remembers theirs—my vote I'll try again!

The ballot-box remembers theirs, the country well might know—
Though in a million only two for little seem to go;
But, somehow, when my ticket slipped I dream'd of Jackson's hand
The land, I thought, has need of One whose will will find a way!

"He did not waver when the need had call'd for action!" I thought—
The word he spoke made plain the deed that lay behind it wrought!
And while I mused the Present fell, and, breathing back the Past,
Again it seem'd the hale young man his vote for Jackson cast!

Thank God it was not lost!—my vote I did not cast in vain!
I go alone to drop my vote—the glorious vote, again!
Alone—where three together fell but one to-day shall fall;
But though I go alone to-day, one voice shall speak for all!

For when our men, awaking quick, from hearth and household came,
Mine did not say, "Another day!" but started like a flame;
I'll vote for them as well as me; they died as soldiers can,
But in my vote their voices each shall claim the right of man.

The elder left his wife and child—my vote for these shall tell;
The younger's sweet-heart has a claim—I'll vote for her as well!
Yes! for the myriad speechless tongues, the myriad sequestered lives,
The desolation at the heart of orphans and of wives!

I go to give my vote alone—I curse your shameless cries!
Who fight for traitors here at home in Peace's holy name!
I go to give my vote alone, but even while I do,
I vote for dead and living, all—the living dead and you!

See yonder tree beside the field, caught in the windy sough,
How conscious of its strength it leans, how straight and steadfast now!
If Lincoln bends (for all, in him, my vote I mean to cast)—
What winds have blown! what storms he's known! —the Hickory's straight at last!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1864.

THE EIGHTH OF NOVEMBER.

THE political campaign which ends in the election of the 8th of NOVEMBER is the most important question in history. It has always been the fate of republics hitherto to be destroyed by the party-spirit has ever-powered patriotism. It has been, therefore, feared by many of the best and wisest men that we should encounter the same peril and succumb to the same fate.

That fear is now about to be confirmed or dispated forever. The American people are about to say that Democracy, Self-government, like all other Governments, has the right to defend its existence by force against foreign enemies and domestic rebels; or it is about to declare that JOHN C. CALHOUN and JEFFERSON DAVIS and GEORGE H. PENDLETON are right, and GEORGE WASHINGTON, ALEXANDER HAMILTON, HENRY CLAY, ANDREW JACKSON, DANIEL WEBSTER, and STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS were wrong in their theory of our Government. It is about to declare that the Union of the United States is the merest partnership at will of sovereign powers, in which the prosperity of the whole is at the mercy of the whim or the anger of the smallest part—or it is to proclaim, unmistakably, that the United States are a nation, with national attributes, with a national history, with a national prosperity, with a national honor, and a national flag.

The Chicago party concedes the destruction of the Government, because it declares that the attempt of the Government to maintain itself by force is a failure. But if it has failed to enforce its authority against rebels, it can therefore exercise over them only so much authority as they choose to allow. That is to say that the United States Government may do in the State of South Carolina just what South Carolina permits, and nothing more. But the United States Government may do as much as that in England. Therefore, if the Chicago platform tells the truth, the United States Government is already and hopelessly overthrown in each of the rebel States. That is the end of the Union. That is the ruin of the country.

Now the Chicago platform is the authorized exposition of the views of the party that supports general M'CLELLAN for President. Therefore it is the candidate of the Chicago party for Vice-President, entirely approves what he calls "the beneficent principles" of that platform. He does not every man, therefore, who votes for the Chicago ticket necessarily vote for the Chicago doctrines? Is not the letter of General M'CLELLAN considered to be a breakwater against the terrible swell of anarchy which proceeds from the Chicago doctrine?

Yet what is the substance of that doctrine but compromise, and what does General M'CLELLAN suggest as the means of restoring the Union but compromise? If rebels refuse to compromise they are to be delivered over to "ulterior consequences"—which means, doubtless, a more abject compromise. But the significant point both in the Chicago platform and in General M'CLELLAN'S letter is, that armed rebels against the Government are not to be put down by force, but are to be coaxed and bought off. That is equally the overthrow of the Government, for it is a premium upon rebellion.

Between the unconditional and the conditional maintenance of the Government the people are now to choose. If they shall decide for the latter, universal disintegration of the Union and endless wars between little neighboring States inevitably ensue. If they elect the former the power and the importance which belong to a great nation will secure them permanent peace, prosperity, and liberty. General M'CLELLAN and GEORGE H. PENDLETON represent the conditional compromise, and ABRAHAM LINCOLN and ANDREW JOHNSON the unconditional maintenance of the Government. May God guide our choice!

THE ARMY VOTE FRAUD.

THE Union citizens of this country have always insisted that the soldiers should vote. They have always held that no American citizen should lose his rights under the Government merely because he loved that Government dearly enough to die in the field to save it. The Copperheads have always insisted that he should.

In Maine the soldiers' voting law was passed, and the only majorities against it were in Copperhead towns. In New Hampshire the law was passed by the Legislature by a vote of about 170 Unionists to 105 Copperheads. In Vermont the Union Legislature promptly passed the bill. In Rhode Island it was opposed only by the Copperheads. In Connecticut the Copperheads unanimously opposed it. In New York the Union men passed a bill by 65 yeas to 59 Copperhead nays, and HORATIO SEYMOUR, President of the M'CLELLAN Chicago Convention, vetoed the bill; but the Union men finally succeeded by appealing to the people of the State, and procuring an amendment to the Constitution which the Copperheads desperately voted against. In New Jersey 37,000 Union citizens asked the passage by the Legislature of a voting law for the soldiers. The Legislature refused by 31 Copperhead nays to 19 Union yeas. In Pennsylvania Judge WOODWARD, the Copperhead candidate for Governor, in favor of whose election General M'CLELLAN wrote a letter, opposed the law. The Unionists then carried an amendment to the Constitution. The greatest majorities for it were in the Union counties; the only majorities against it were in Copperhead counties. In Delaware, where the Copperheads control the Legislature, the soldiers have been denied the right of voting. In Ohio the Copperheads steadily and in every way opposed the law. But it was passed by Union votes and sustained by the Supreme Court of the State. In Michigan 19 Union Senators to 10 Copperheads, and 54 Union to 25 Copperhead representatives, passed the law. In Illinois the Copperheads controlling the Legislature, defeated the law; and General JOHN A. LOGAN, the boson friend of DOUGLAS, is disfranchised because he believes as DOUGLAS said upon his death-bed: "A man can not be a true Democrat unless he is a loyal patriot. Cast treason as he is only fitting for his country. In Wisconsin the bill passed by 19 Unionists to 7 Copperheads in the Senate, and by 54 Unionists to 25 Copperheads in the Assembly. In California, Iowa, Minnesota, and Missouri the Union men against the steady Copperhead opposition have secured the soldiers' right to vote. In Indiana the Copperhead Legislature refused it.

Such is the prodigious record. In every State the Copperheads—friends of M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON have opposed in every way and at every stage the right of American soldiers to vote, because they were in the field fighting for their country. The Copperheads made Patriotism a crime.

Yet, again, American soldiers are not fools. They know exactly what they are fighting for; therefore, in the case of the single State of Ohio, out of 55,000 soldiers' votes cast in October there was a majority of 43,000 for the Union. And now, as appears by the confession of Mr. J. FERRY, the Copperhead State Agent for the Army of the State of New York, a vast conspiracy was undertaken by the Copperheads to forge the soldiers' vote, and elect GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN, the friend of VALLANDIGHAM, by defeating the honest will of the citizens in the field.

Does any loyal American citizen still ask himself whether the Copperheads and their Chicago platform and candidates can be faithful to the Union and the Government? Was this universal Copperhead opposition to the soldiers' voting law in the Legislatures a serious effort at a fraudulent defeat of the fair consequences of the passage of the law, in the interest of the United States Government, or of JEFFERSON DAVIS and the rebellion?

THE LESSON OF THE RAIDS.

THE sudden and startling raid from Canada across the frontier of Vermont is a striking illustration of the practical consequences of State sovereignty and secession. The rebels assert that they are only maintaining State sovereignty. But in a system like that they propose every State would be a little separate foreign power to every other, and each would be always exposed to such armed surprises, robberies, and murders as those of the recent raid upon Vermont. The absolute and hopeless anarchy resulting from the triumph of the rebels' doctrine of State sovereignty can not be concealed. We have seen of its inevitable tendency by remembering that when, in the winter of 1860–61, some of the Southern States declared their secession from the Union and the resumption of their sovereignty, FERNANDO WOOD, then Mayor, suggested that the city of New York might find it wise to secede from the State. And then the First Ward might have found it wise to secede from the Second; and so the entire fabric of social order have fallen into common ruin.

The doctrine of supreme State sovereignty is the doctrine of humiliation and disgrace. The famous history of this country is that of united Colonies and United States. Before they were united there was no history. The history of England and France is the story of weakness, shame, and bloodshed, until the various parts were welded into a great national whole. It is not an Englishman's boast that he is a Kentish man or a Yorkshireman, but an Englishman. It is not a Frenchman's pride that he is a Gascon or a Burgundian, but a Frenchman. It is not Yorkshire or Burgundy that protects them, that gives them importance, that makes them respected and feared. It is the name and the nation of England and France that does this. The flag of their country is not the Kentish or Gascon flag —it is the British and the French; it is the cross of St. George and the tri-color.

It is precisely so with us. The power of this nation in the world is not the power of Maine, or Delaware, or Missouri, or California; it is that of the United States. The importance of every citizen is not that he is a Vermonter or a Georgian, but an American of the United States. The flag that defends him every where in the world is not the Pelican of Louisiana, or the Palmetto of South Carolina, or the Anchor of Rhode Island; it is the glorious Stars and Stripes. The doctrine of supreme State sovereignty plucks all power and significance from that flag. It makes it represent not the overwhelming force of a nation—not the terrible energy of a trained and invincible army and navy, but the ridiculous impotence of a guerrilla band. The doctrine of supreme State sovereignty is national suicide.

Yet that is the doctrine of the rebellion and of the Chicago lender to the rebellion. The Chicago platform confesses the victory of this doctrine over the national power of the Union. General M'CLELLAN'S letter, in his proposal of compromise with the rebel chiefs, stands straight upon the Chicago platform, for he proposes to treat with those who, by force of arms, assert State sovereignty against the national supremacy. Should such a policy be adopted by the people of this country in his elevation to the Presidency, every State would be a separate power exposed to the incursions of neighboring enemies. Every State must maintain an army to defend its border against St. Albans raids. If the States made a compact not to harm each other, it would be as fruitless as Mr. PENDLETON now declares the Union to be, if the States refuse to observe the compact," he says, "you have no right to force them to observe it."

If, then, armies must be maintained to defend sovereign State lines, does any man think he would escape the permanent draft which would be necessary to fill those armies? Would he avoid the taxes necessary to support those armies? When Pennsylvania and Ohio chose to threaten Delaware, what hope or refuge would Delaware have? Would Maryland and Richmond aim at separation as a means of peace? Many a man in the North thinks that a vote which Chicago candidates would give the country peace, and so release him from drafts and taxation. But if what we say be true—and who will deny it?—does he not see that Union, and Union alone, means strength and consequently security and peace? And does it not follow that, if the power of the Union is assailed, it must be maintained unconditionally, or else it will be overthrown? Whoever dictates conditions is master of the field. When once the Union is destroyed by force of arms—as the Chicago platform declares it now the case, we have before us endless wars, taxes, and conscriptions; we have impotence, ruin, and anarchy, ending in hopeless despotism.

Let every thoughtful citizen bear these things in mind, and then vote for M'CLELLAN and PENDLETON, who represent this policy, if he can.

STRAWS.

GOOD citizens will have observed that the party which has most loudly clamored for free speech in this campaign has been the party whose adherents have made almost all the disturbance in the canvass. In meetings have been constantly interrupted by M'CLELLAN partisans. Have Union men any where attempted to break up M'CLELLAN meetings? Union flags have been cut down by the friends of the Chicago platform and M'CLELLAN. Have Union flags been cut down by Union men? Are bonnets? Processions have been attacked, speakers have been insulted, every kind of interference and annoyance has been practiced. Have these things been done by the loyal Union citizens or by M'CLELLAN partisans? Are the men who have declared that, in certain events, they will not submit to the result of the election the friends of MR. LINCOLN or of General M'CLELLAN?

We do not assert that Union men may not sometimes have been guilty of disturbance in the meetings of the Chicago party; but we challenge contradiction in saying that the disturbing element at the vast mass of meetings where there has been any disturbance was composed of M'CLELLAN partisans. These are the men who bawl for free speech. They call the President a fool and a tyrant. They say he keeps in a certain instance—"the obscene ape of Illinois," and the next moment shout that the liberty of speech is threatened. They print articles to favor the insurrection against the Government of the United States, appealing to every base passion of ignorant men, or merely sophisticating in smooth phrases to excite hostility to the authorities, and then cry aloud that the freedom of the press is in danger.

These things they do with absolute impunity, and shriek incessantly that the liberties of American citizens are imperiled, because now and then a man has been summarily arrested for helping the enemies of the country. That this power, which necessarily resides in every Government at war, has been in every instance wisely exercised, is not claimed; nor could such power ever be used at all, whatever the emergency, without complaint from somebody. But that it has been used at all has not been to attempt to inspire distrust of the intention. It has been used, as in this country it always must be, subject to impeachment. To say that loyal citizens have lost their liberties, or are, in general, in danger of "bastiles," is ludicrously false.

Such things show the spirit of the Chicago party. Is it a faithful, loyal, patriotic spirit? Does it raise such cries really to save the Government, or to get it into their hands? Are the men who break up Union meetings truly in favor of free speech? Are the papers that speak of Mr. LINCOLN as the Aurora used to speak of General WASHINGTON really deprived of their "liberty?" Yet all these men and these papers labor for the election of General M'CLELLAN. Is that the company a good Union-loving citizen wishes to keep? Is that the candidate the true friends of free speech wish to vote for?

Straws show how the tide is running.

PODSNAPPERY.

IF any nation is anxious to see the overthrow of the American Government it is the English. The British press has said and done all it could to aid the rebellion; and its organs cheer lustily for General M'CLELLAN and Mr. PENDLETON. Some weeks ago the London Post, the organ of LORD PALMERSTON, the British Prime Minister, under the heading, "American Union passing away," said:

"The institutions of the American Republic were, in the fullest signification of the term, liberal, and in no country in the world has more keen regret been felt than in true England that those institutions should be, to all appearance, on the point of extinction."

The spirit which thus complacently chuckles over what it calls the prospect of our national ruin, instinctively works and prays for the defeat of ABRAHAM LINCOLN and ANDREW JOHNSON, whose careers from the poverty in which they were born to the distinction they have reached are noble illustrations of the operation of American institutions.

COLONEL LOWELL.

THE late COLONEL LOWELL, whose portrait is upon page 733, and of whom we spoke last week, was buried on Friday, October 28, at Mount Auburn, in Cambridge, near Boston. His commission as a Brigadier-General had been signed, and was on the way to him when as fell.

A letter from a correspondent in speak says: "I do not think there was any officer in all the army so much beloved as LOWELL."

"We all died today," said OSIRIS, "when we knew that we had lost him. It is the greatest loss the cavalry corps has suffered."

"I do not think there was a quality," said SHERIDAN, "which I would have added to LOWELL."

"ELECTION DAY."

MR. NAST and MR. BELLEW have done admirable pictorial service in this paper for the Union cause. The grave and poetic designs of MR. NAST and the clear, comic pungency of MR. BELLEW'S caricatures, have brought home the issues of this canvass to many a mind more forcibly than any argument or speech.

This week MR. NAST shows us the significance of the scene at the ballot-box. Surrounded by illustrations of the various persons and classes who decide at the polls the fate of the country and of free popular institutions, the figure of Peace, with drooping head and clipped wings, as if prostituted to a hateful purpose, with her hands manacled behind her, stands before the sacred urn, while the twin Satans of secession and sympathy with it push their bullets into her hand. But opposite to Peace, erect, and majestic, the consciousness of victory in her heart and its fire beaming in her eye—the ripe and noble figure of the Country, Abraham Union and Liberty, drops her ballot into the box. You can read upon it the name of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, whom the heart of that Country desires to see the next President of the United States.

AN UNANSWERABLE QUESTION.

A CORRESPONDENT in the interior of New York asks:

"Can you explain the present anomalous position of the so-called Democratic party? If a large portion of the Democratic presses and orators are, as they claim, truly loyal, why do they so persistently oppose every attempt of the constituted authorities to suppress the rebellion? They cry out and call aloud for fair play, and yet constantly pervert and misconstrue willfully every act of the Government. They have long prayers for our 'bleeding country,' and yet refer nothing but hyssop and vinegar to soothe it in the hour of agony. What judgment will be meted out by coming generations to these would-be cured healers?"

"As they sow so shall they reap."

A SOLDIER'S VOTE.

A SOLDIER forwards us the Union National and State ticket, and writes: "I go this Winter to vote without any repugnance of conscience. We unite traitors! We will whip them."

A MILITARY BLISTER FOR COPPERHEADS.

IN the United States Military Hospital at Jeffersonville, Indiana, a thorough canvass of the inmates in September showed the following result:

Lincoln and Johnson	60
M'Clellan and Pendleton	2
Doubtful	1

The veterans add that th Copperhead vote is given In aid of "the democratic aristocracy," which is to say to overthrow the Government, and they say of the party which can not heartily cheer for the victories of SHERIDAN, SHERMAN, GRANT, and FARRAGUT: "They should be remembered as long as they live for their treachery, and be forever denied by their estranged countrymen the privilege of holding any office of honor, profit, or trust; and so far as our knowledge of them and our votes and influence will effect it, they shall be."

OUR "PATTERNS."

THE following letter comes from two gentlemen who, beyond any doubt whatever, intend to vote for General M'CLELLAN and MR. PENDLETON; who confide reverently in MR. VALLANDIGHAM; who declare that "Abolition war," and "ABE LINCOLN'S despotism," who wish well to the rebellion, and desire, as faithful supporters of the Chicago platform and candidates, to confess that the American people are conquered, and to implore the gracious pardon of JEFFERSON DAVIS. For all these reasons the two gentlemen do not like this paper. We should be heartily ashamed of ourselves if they did:

"Ed. of Harper's Weekly: NEWARK, O., Oct. 21, '64.

"DEAR SIR—Please to mark oblige your Patterns at this office if you will pleas keep your dam Blagued Sheet at home, or find it to them that can Stomic it. We can not give it any longer."

SPEKE.

DIED TUESDAY, 15TH SEPTEMBER, 1864.

SOUTHWARD to unearth a secret
Kept six thousand years
Onward, onward, one of England's Boldest pioneers

One with high determination
Held in perfect drill:
Working out a fixed purpose
Grappled by the will.

Up the highway of a river,
Conning silently,
With a friend, mysterious volume
To the Syrian Sea.

Girt with courage of the SAXON—
Stridelh on a man,
Breaking down great walls of hindrance,
As a Titan can.

Type of an immortal precept
That hath ever stood
As a beacon to the nations—
English hardihood.

Tracking down the Ethiop stream line,
Resolute to win
Access to the hidden chamber
Of its origin.

Throwing back great waves of peril
Rising in the way;
Out upon the sea of venture
Valiantly he lay.

Captured by the fierce SOMALI,
Wounded, scorched, and bound,
By a lance his wary muscles
Nailed to the ground.

Still the storied, bull-dog valor
Of the island race
Taught him how to dash his fetters
In his captor's face.

Up he springs to tear the cordage
From his swollen hands;
Girds him for escape—his bold blood
Dripping on the sands.

Manly, sun-burnt features settled
To an iron calm—
Lo! he sleeps beneath the heavy
Shadow of the palm.

Head upon his arm—the north land
Visited in dream;
While the snaffle of tropic fire
Tremble on the stream

Home! from many a close-locked wrestle
Where grim death did press
Hard upon him as he journeyed
Through the trackless.

Home! to meet the grip of welcome
From an English hand;
Home! to find his deeds of daring
Famous in the land.

Home! his triumph by a people
Countersigned and sure!
Home! to find the spoiler waiting
On an English fleld.

From the gable of a farm-house
Curl the wreaths of smoke;
Through a copse the sunlight quivers
On the browning oak.

Past the underwood and flowers
Murmureth the burn;
Past a shuttered hearth lying
On the tangled fern.

HUMORS OF THE DAY

THE following is related as "the President's best story": "Mr. Lincoln, when he was a young lawyer, was one day at the office waveled him, and finally exhausted his patience; Mr. Lincoln said to him, 'Sir, I will tell you a story to illustrate the matter who told one of his pupils to read the third chapter of Daniel. The pupil very hearty, and he came to the names of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, he stumbled. The master required him to proceed. He tried again and failed. Pedagogue then tried a fogging, but still no go. Relenting, the master told the boy he might read the preceding chapter, and let the present one go. The boy brightened up and took hold with a will. He got on famously until he reached the last verse, when, pausing, a look of consternation overcame his countenance and he dropped the book, exclaiming in a doleful voice, 'Why here are them three accursed fellows again!' The trio stopped, and some of their friends say it was a fair hit.

"This is the last rose of summer!" exclaimed a wag, as he tore from his hat on the 22d of August.

Let a man do his best, and the world may do its worst.

JACKSON BOOTS and SEYMOUR SLIPPERS.

One of our patriotic clergy of this city lately said that he had looked with great hope to the Chicago Convention, thinking that they might start a patriotic movement that would unite the heart of the nation and break down the old party walls. But he was bitterly disappointed. All that was necessary was to build a hickory platform, raise the old flag over it, and hang a pair of Andrew Jackson's old boots on the flagstaff. Instead of hickory, we had at Chicago a platform made of the old flag, there was no shoe that was so dim and uncertain as to puzzle the lookers-on to tell what it was the Stars and Stripes or Andrew and Boz: instead of Andrew Jackson's old boots, there was "Jeff Davis's" brass-inlaid slippers—slippery enough they were too.

THE ONION AND THE UNION.

DR. OGDEN gave the Centennial Address before the Fairfield County farmers at Norwalk, Connecticut, September 28—the very day which signalized the great farming interest next to the country, and the immense power of patriotic feeling which the Revolutionary times and in the whole of our national history. He said he had heard of a few cases of disaffected farmers who dispersed at once when the present rebellion broke out, because the price of onions fell in the first panic. The true farmer, he said, is above such baseness, and cares not only for his crops, but for his country. He likes to sell the onion, but he will not sell the Union. He may think that great is the Onion, but greater is that which prefer is the Union.

Lord Brougham told the following anecdote at the late meeting of the Social Science Congress: Horne Tooke was sitting in a box at the play one day when he marked a hostile, brandishing a large-bladed knife in his hand. The hostile said, "Sir, am Mr. Horne Tooke, are you not?" "Yes," was the reply. "Then," said the lunatic, "I will soon put an end to your existence." Tooke answered, "If you do you will suffer for it." "Oh," said the madman, "I came out of Bedlam's asylum without Colter the day I can't punish me." Horne Tooke rejoined, with great tact, "Then I suppose you intend to have that a law was passed only (other day saying that all lunatics should be hanged?" "No, I didn't hear," replied the madman, instantly throwing down the knife in a tremor and sinking out of the room.

A bull is good eating in any land. Here is a fine one produced by the Indépendance in a burst of fine writing: "A hundred thousand hearts were beating as they witnessed the ascent of Nadar; a hundred thousand eyes were watching the progress of the balloon. Every one knew that each possessor of a heart was either shutting one eye or had but one eye, like the Cyclops Polyphemus.

Lord Norbury was celebrated equally for his wit and his severity as a criminal judge. At one time, as a special commission was sitting in the city to try the culprits in one of the Irish rebellions, he had in course of a sitting convicted a great many. As you going on at such a rapid rate, my lord," said a counsel for the prisoners. "Yes," answered his unfeeling lordship, "seven leaps an hour."

THE TOPER'S AUTUMN SOLILOQUY.

Leaves have their time to fall,
And to skies have I;
The autumn has a time,
Both comes of getting dry.

But here's the difference 'twixt you and me,
I fall more herder and more frequently.

Unfortunately for the effect, Not one of them men understood the French language, with characteristic John-Bullism applauded to interrupt the progress of the piece. At the most solemn part of the piece the prompter gave the order to go off. "Bother," said he, but the German soldiers, hearing nothing of the play, mistook the word for "donder," whereupon all the soldiers began shaking fists at the astonishment of the assembly of the audience, and, it is to be presumed, to the disgust of the actors, who made their efforts to move their auditors to tears rendered abortive by the blunder.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE VIRGINIA CAMPAIGN.

On Thursday, October 28, General Grant moved his entire army for the purpose of finding an other flank some distance beyond that in front of Petersburg. The movement is neither directed nor a fortunate issue.

On Friday, October 28, the Fifth and Sixth corps advanced in three separate columns. The Second Corps by a circuitous route from the north of Hatcher's Run, and thence northwestwardly to Hatcher's Run, three miles beyond the extreme left. Here they met the enemy, drawn up in thick lines, forty or more, including a major, were captured. The Second Corps, after a severe engagement, struck the Boydton road, along which the enemy has been massing troops to strike into the rebel rear at Petersburg. The Fifth Corps advanced by a more direct route, and reached the Boydton road on the right of the Second. The Sixth, under command of the Ninth Corps, which moved up to the right of the Fifth. The Fifth Corps, after a severe struggle of hard, steady fighting, gained advantage to us, as it secured possession of several commanding positions, and the enemy was completely cut across the Southside Railroad. The rebels, withdrawing their forces from Petersburg, to the number of 30,000, fell upon the Second and Fifth corps, attacked with great fury, but in vain. They were repulsed with the loss of a rebel Major-General's Division of Hill's Corps. Fighting under cover of the woods, the rebel division advanced at first gained an advantage, and inflicting on the Second Corps a momentary check, but the attack was finally repulsed, though Grant was compelled to withdraw. At the close of the day the enemy made a whole brigade of prisoners, captured by the Second Corps. The rebel cavalry followed the Federals as they withdrew, but inflicted no injury. The enemy's loss was about 1500. We took 800 prisoners and four battle-flags.

The same day Butler's army north of the James commenced with the extreme on his left by a movement on the extreme right. In the morning the Eighteenth Corps, under General Ord, in advance of cavalry, passed across the Darbytown to the Charles City Road, having orders to move down the latter road, and attack the rear and flank of the enemy's left flank, and to turn it if possible.

The Tenth Corps, on the main line, took a position on the Darbytown Road, facing toward Richmond, Foster's Division on the centre, and Ames's on the right. The rebels were a little distance in front, under cover of the woods. Skirmishers were kept up until day.

By 4 P.M. Weitzel, with the Eighteenth Corps, had advanced through the Charles City Road, and reached the Williamsburg Road, not far from the "Seven Pines" battle-field. The enemy's line on this road was found to be weakly defended, and two brigades were ordered to attempt to break it. At two o'clock the two brave brigades were became exposed to a terrible cross-fire. Soon after the attack made good their return, but the greater part of the two brigades were captured. Four miles farther on the right the Tenth Corps advanced. Ames's men, at the same time, a rebellion mounting two guns. Orders were given to withdraw to the entire evening to return to their intrenchments.

THE WESTERN CAMPAIGN.

October 17 General Rosencrans assumed command of the military division of the West. In an address issued to his command he says:

"The army of Sherman still defiantly holds Atlanta. He will not be driven from it. He will not go for the good people of Georgia and the surrounding States to speak like men, and the rights of the brave. We now command provisions. There are men enough in the country to feed and able for the service to accomplish this return.

"To all such I earnestly appeal to report promptly to their respective commands, and to them who are not to be sure to it that none remain who are able to strike a blow in the critical hour of danger. To those soldiers, I say, who are absent from their commands without leave, I appeal to you by the memory of your comrades who have fallen, by the pain of the wounded, by the agonies of the captives at Andersonville, by the memory of the loved ones at home, by your own honor, by your love of country, by your love of God, to return to your colors and to your duty.

"To all such as shall report to their respective commands within ten days from the date of this order, I promise that no further punishment than the loss of pay for the time absent. To those who are absent beyond ten days and not reported, I promise to be merciful. To those who shall be absent beyond twenty days as unmercy is hereby granted. My appeal is made to you as soldiers and citizens, to come forward freely, cheerfully, and with good heart to the defense of the flag.

He has been too strong to resist. Hence it is with gratitude that I am able to state officially that measures have been taken, and are being made for the raising complete, three hundred thousand slaves, whose services are to be compensated by the Confederate Government. The slaves thus armed are to have their freedom at the close of the war, and to themselves their permanent homes in the South."

THE ADMISSION OF STATE OF NEVADA.

The Territory of Nevada, which has just been admitted to the Union as a State, in proclamation of President Lincoln, was organized by act of Congress in 1861, from portions about ten thousand square miles were appropriated from the northern portion of Utah Territory, and about seventy thousand from Washington Utah.

At the date of its organization the Territory possessed a population of very nearly 7000 white settlers. The discovery of her mineral resources was rapid and almost without parallel, and attracted a constant stream of immigration to the Territory. As in all mining districts she has been subject to the fluctuations from which mining districts have suffered, the growth of Nevada has been found to be steady. At the last census enumeration there were nearly 11,000 votes were cast; during the present year great accession to the population have been made.

A PICTURE IN WATER-COLORS.

BY MILES O'REILLY.

'Twas a bright expanse of water
Where the Quaker's gentle daughter
Every summer morning sought her
Bath of beauty, light, and grace;
Quite a fleet of drifted lilies
Danced above the mimic billows,
And a screen of drooping willows
Curtained close the bathing-place.

In my skiff at random floating,
Rod and line but little noting—
Ah! what subtle charm had loading
Since the bathing-place was known!
I across the lake was drifted,
While with life my fancy gifted
Every lily-shoulder lifted
White and dimpled as her own!

"Ah, how clear!" I muttered, eying
Many a colored pebble lying Far below, and vainly trying
On some book to fix my thought;
"Now some good breeze hither winging,
Set you silver curtain swinging—
Coolness to the bather bringing!"
But the good breeze answered not.

Homeward o'er the meadows tripping,
All the lovelier for her dipping,
Soon I saw the maiden skipping,
While sad gravity, when we met:
"Friend, thou'rt strangely fond of boating;"
And my weak heart quailed on noting
That serious laughter floating
In the eyes of my coquette.

BUYING A RECRUIT.

The blasting afternoon sunshine drew lines of moving gold across the velvet grass at Central Park—the air, just touched with a keen suspicion of coming frosts, was full of October sweetness; and the full tide of metropolitan fashion was rolling down the drive, while Jervis Payne leaned against a rustic iron chair at the junction of two broad roads, and surveyed the "turn-outs" with a critical eye.

"Heigho!" sighed Mr. Payne, drearily, "it's rather tiresome work standing here, and not seeing a soul one knows. It's a dreadful bore not having any thing to do, one's self! I wish I was a rope-dancer—or a policeman—or one of those chaps in blue overalls, pegging away at the stone-wall on Fifth Avenue. What—why, hullo, Maurice Almy, this is never you!"

For a stylish little carriage with one gentleman driving in front, and a solemn servant with folded arms occupying the back seat, conjointly with a velvet-draped dog, had dashed close up to him with a sudden check.

"Whom else should it be?" demanded a clear, merry voice. "Jump up quick; these horses want feathers to hold in; and I feel quite conscious that two months in bed don't make a fellow any stronger than he was before! Are you all right? Then lore goes!"

"But, Almy," stammered the astounded Jervis, "I thought you were laid up for all winter."

"No! it takes more than a chance bullet-hole to use me up."

"But your foot—"

"Oh, it's healing up all right. A little painful yet; and I shall be lame for life if I take more than two months of practice to convince myself that a crutch is better than a foot. However—"

"I suppose I must call you Major Almy now," said Payne, lightly touching the glittering insignia on his companion's broad shoulder. Almy's brow contracted.

"Major Almy, off duty for the rest of his life! Oh, if I were not the lowest private in my regiment, to be able to strike another blow for the cause I honor! See here, Jervis Payne! what are you doing with a time all to kill? Why don't you enlist? Come! go in my vacant place!"

Jervis Payne shook his head with a calmness that was exquisitely irritating to the enthusiastic young officer.

"We don't look at the thing in the same light, Maurice."

"Jervis Payne, don't give me reason to suspect that you have joined the crew of Copper 'ads! Remember I'm strong enough yet to pitch you out of the carriage!"

Payne smiled.

"Gently, Almy; we shall both have our necks broken if you drive in that hap-hazard style!"

"Then I am to suppose you don't care a sliver for the country?"

"Oh yes; I love my country well enough," yawned Payne. "Don't I pay my income-tax, and give a quarter to every old impostor that comes to the door an army-bale suit and a mile-log in about the hospital he has just been discharged from? Of course I'm patriotic enough, and all that sort of thing; but that's no reason I should go and hunt big head up against Jeff Davis's cannon!"

"And you call yourself a citizen of the American Republic?"

"I take that liberty."

"And avail yourself unblushingly of the privileges of a country which you are unwilling to uphold?"

"Hold on there!—there are two sides to that argument, if you please. How very pretty Miss Aubrey looks to-night, and what a gracious smile she gave you! They say she's uncommonly sweet on you, Maurice—eh?"

"Nonsense!" ejaculated Major Almy, vexed to feel the blood mounting to his pale cheek.

"There!" pursued Payne, "she's turned half way round to look at that interesting crutch of yours. It's a great thing to be a wounded hero! With plenty of money. But, as I was saying—"

"Yes, as you were saying—"

"What's the use of tramping off to the wars myself, when I've paid money enough to hire half a dozen Irishmen to stand up and be shot at."

"But we don't want money—we want men."

"Meaning that you want me. No, I thank you!"

"Jervis, I never thought you were a coward."

"Now, look here, Almy!" exclaimed Payne, roused at last into the semblance of energy, "that's not fair. I am not a red-hot fanatic on the subject of war, neither do I pretend to be. You are one of the fiery, dashing fellows that fairly enjoy marching up to a line of fixed bayonets. Fighting is your element—you like the fun!"

"The fun," repeated Almy, in a low, grave voice, glancing down at the bandaged stump that lay on a cushion close to the dash-board.

"Well, I mean, of course, the excitement of the thing. It is no sacrifice for you to turn soldier, and draw your pay in glory, trumpet blasts from all the papers, a major's shoulder-straps, and a bouquet for your sick room every day, with Miss Aubrey's card stuck into it. It's not so disagreeable to fight for one's country on such terms as those! But I mean to say that, when it comes to the fact of real, disagreeable self-denial, you wouldn't be any readier than I am. As I said before, it is a matter of personal taste. Let the country call upon Major Maurice Almy to sow wood or cut out army coats at a dollar a day for its hospital matters would wear altogether a different aspect!"

"Do you think so?"

"I am sure of it."

"I should just like a fair trial—that's all!"

"Should you? Well, then, listen to me," said Payne, with the easy affability of a man patronizingly disliked: "You are an ingrain aristocrat, Maurice Almy, with fastidious tastes that a thousand years of soldier-like valor could not alter. Don't shake your head—I know you better than you know yourself. Now, I'm willing to make a bargain with you."

"State your terms."

"Do you know old Raeburn, the shoemaker?"

"Do I know him? No, I believe I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance; but I know where your mansion is, and I know, whom the ladies rather like to patronize, in ——Street!"

"Old Raeburn is very much in want of a clerk in his store, to sell shoes, and take in the cash, and keep his accounts, besides doing any other dirty work that comes uppermost."

"Is he? What the mischief is that to me?"

"Just this. If you will take the position and fulfill its duties, I will buy you a substitute."

"Me!—In Isaac Raeburn's store!"

"—I will enlist the next day," pursued Payne, with a sudden flash of energy in the probability he saw his proposal being for an instant entertained.

"Now we shall see whether Major Maurice Almy really loves his country one whit better than I."

"You're in earnest?" asked Almy, turning round so as to look full into his companion's sarcastic eye.

"Of course I am."

"Well, then, agreed! When do my duties commence?"

"Not just yet, of course—your foot—"

"Oh, hang my foot! Say next week."

"Yes; but mind you, this is a bet between us. You go in as Raeburn's bona fide clerk, not as a knight of romance, fulfilling some rash vow."

"All right! I'll be clerk in the store."

"You'll never screw up courage to face your fashionable acquaintance behind old Raeburn's counter. It's a capital joke now, but it will lose its point when the time comes. I am quite safe."

Almy laughed and touched up his horses as they dashed into Bloomingdale Road.

"Mind," ejaculated Payne, as he dismounted from the carriage, "it is to be a whole day."

"Two, if you like."

"No, one will be sufficient; I merely wish to test the matter." And he walked away, mentally chuckling to think how neatly he had cornered the haughty young officer, whose mustache and horses were the best "gotten up" in Central Park.

"Maurice, what on earth have you been doing to yourself?" cried Carrie Delmont? Why do you wear that absurd old gray suit?"

Mary Almy held up both hands in dismay. Maurice himself was scarcely less disconcerted; he had not reckoned on this rencounter.

"My dear Polly, I thought you were safely packed off for three weeks in Albany."

"But I had to come back for my reticule. There's no hurry; I don't miss the train. Seriously, Maurice, what is the meaning of this masquerade?"

"Only one of my idiosyncrasies, as Carrie Dewey used to say. Don't scold me, Mary. I wonder what has ever become of her! I think she was the prettiest little creature I ever saw."

Mary Almy's face grew grave; she had hoped her brother had forgotten the boy-and-girl-attachment of four ago, broken abruptly off by the worldly-minded guardian, who had Carrie Dewey's pale blue eyes were scarcely an equivalent for the wealth of the Almys.

"Maurice, Maurice! Why, Parker will be ashamed to drive you out!"

"I should be sorry to hurt Parker's delicate feelings; but fortunately I am not going to order the carriage; I shall take an omnibus."

"With your foot!"

Maurice put his hand caressingly on his sister's arm—

"Polly, how many of the wounded men in our regiment do you suppose keep a carriage? And yet they contrive to exist very comfortably."

Mary made a little grimace; but she remembered the railroad time-table, and hurried down stairs, greatly to her brother's relief.

"Major Almy a clerk in Raeburn's store! I don't believe a word of it!"

Miss Edith Aubrey gave the plume on her velvet hat a little contemptuous toss.

"But I tell you, Edith, I saw him there," said Mrs. Melville, delighted at having come into possession of such an invaluable morsel of gossip, "selling a box of corn-plaster to old Dr. Jeffreys. You may depend on it that this fine fortune has all blown up—how true it is that riches have wings! After all Mary Almy's airs and graces, to think of her brother in a shoe-store!"

"But isn't he entitled to some sort of pension?"

"My dear, the always are just the kind of people to refuse any such trifling help from Government, and rely entirely on their own exertions. As proud as Lucifer, every one of 'em! Let me—be changes in this world! Wouldn't you like to go round there, Edith? I left my glove on purpose."

Maurice Almy, apparently consulting his watch, and marveling at the slow motion of its hour-hand, when Mr. Raeburn's shrill, cracked voice summoned him with a comical air of authority.

"Young man, young man, I say! you'll never learn shoe-lacing at that rate if you stand dawdlin' there. Just look on the shelf under the counter, and give me a pair of them No. 8 calf-skins!"

Maurice stooped with some difficulty, laughing mentally at his own vexation as he did so. The next moment he started nervously as Miss Aubrey's face appeared on the other side of the counter, reached his ear.

Of course there never was any thing more than a flirtation between us. Fancy me being tied for life to a poor soldier with only one foot!"

"Well, I suppose," pursued Mrs. Melville, "you know people will talk, and—" She stopped abruptly, and touched her companion's elbow. "There he is!—do you suppose he hears us, Edith?"

Miss Aubrey's cheeks were like scarlet as she acknowledged Almy's bow with the least possible nod.

"I left a glove here, I believe," began Mrs. Melville. "Oh, thank you; that's all!"

There was no other carrier an ignominious retreat, while Maurice looked after them with a curious smile.

"Please, Sir, mammy wants a pair o' leather shoe-strings. How much be they?" asked a ragged old whose eyes were long on a level with the counter.

Maurice turned the box of leather strings dubiously this way and that.

"Five cents a piece they are marked."

"Oh dear!" lamented the little one, "and I ain't got but four!"

"Never mind—it's all right," returned the clerk, absently, tossing the little paper parcel across the counter.

"All right! It's all wrong, I say!" croaked Raeburn, turning livid with wrath, as he scrambled out of his high stool in time to see the ragged calico skirts disappearing down the street. "Why didn't you send her house for tother penny? What do you mean by sellin' our first-class articles under price?"

"Really, Sir," said Almy, coloring, "I didn't suppose it was of any such importance."

"Dear me, dear me!" groaned the old man; "you'll never answer my purpose in the world. I took you for a soldier—Mr. Payne, and out o' charity—'tisn't every man who would employ a clerk who has to go on a crutch—and this is the way you repay my money. Now, I just give you fair warnin'; you've got to toe the mark a little straighter!"

He broke off, and shuffled smilingly down the store to attend a customer, while Maurice Almy pocketed a strong inclination to resign his post by a still stronger recollection of the recruit he was purchasing.

"No! twelve o'clock yet! Will the day never come to an end?" he pondered, slowly obeying the imperious gesture of his employer, and advancing to meet a plain looking girl in a shabby black dress who crept meekly up to the counter.

"Are my shoes mended yet?" she asked, without looking up, "in the name was Dewey."

"Carrie!"

She started, with a wild, frightened glance.

"Mr. Almy!"

The ubiquitous Raeburn pushed forward a pair of worn little goaties, embellished with a black leather patch on the side.

"Fifteen cents," was his brief commentary.

Maurice took the worn quarter which Carrie laid down, and his cheek flushed as he laid it in the money drawer, and returned a dingy ten-cent stamp.

"Don't go yet, Carrie," he pleaded, inwardly execrating the fate that kept him a prisoner in the dark little store. "Tell me where you are, and what you are doing!"

"I live in W—— Street," said Carrie, venturing to lift her blue eyes to Maurice's face, "and I am coloring photographs for Mr. Wood."

"As you see," he returned, "I am a clerk in a shoe store."

She paused and hesitated a moment; then spoke in a hurried, embarrassed tone as her eye rested on his worn and pallid features.

"Oh, Maurice!" she said; "you don't like to tell me all, but I see it nevertheless. You are ill—you are lame—you are afraid you are in want. We read in the papers about how you were wounded, but I never thought you could be poor. We are very poor too, but I have a little money laid up. Oh, Maurice! if you would only take it for the sake of old times. Indeed, indeed I don't want it."

Maurice felt a choking sensation in his throat as he looked into the shy, lovely face, flushed with its pitying mode of appeal.

"No, you dear little Fairy Bountiful," he said, trying to smile gayly, "I don't want your hard-earned money; but I may want something else one of these days."

"What, Maurice?"

"Can't you guess?"

She turned away with a fresh glow on her cheek, and tripped out of the store, holding the worn little gaiters tightly under her shawl, while Maurice found it harder than ever to sell shoe-strings, rubber sandals, and cork-soles to his master's satisfaction.

At length the "long, long, weary day" darkened into night, and Mr. Raeburn, whose monthly gas-bills were sharper to his soul than a serpent's tooth, prepared to close his establishment.

Maurice Almy was counting up the day's receipts, with his employer's sharp face close to his shoulder, when Jervis Payne came in.

"Well, old fellow!" was his first greeting.

"Well, Payne. Thirty-seven dollars seven and sixpence, Sir."

"Yes, all right, young man. You'll be here early in the morning?"

"If you want me, Mr. Raeburn," said Payne, "I'm much obliged to you for giving him the day's trial, but I hardly think you'll suit each other."

Mr. Raeburn glanced at the big clock that hung from the store. It was a problem beyond his powers of solution.

"Almy," ejaculated Payne, as they passed into the cheerful glare of Broadway, "you've got more brass-buttons than I had any idea of."

"Thank you," returned Almy, dryly.

"I give up. I confess myself fairly defeated. I'll enlist to-morrow morning. Tell me, though, wasn't it a hard day's work?"

"Rather; but I have done harder."

"I've been guilty of your crime, old fellow," said Payne, with rather a decorous accent.

"I have gained something else too."

"What, pray?"

"Never mind just now. Perhaps I'll tell you one of these days. Jervis Payne," he added, with singular emphasis, "you have done me the greatest favor I ever received in my life through this odd freak of yours."

"Well, it was an odd idea," owned Payne, frankly. "I never supposed you'd have the nerve and resolution to carry it through. Now you see set the women's tongues wagging to be sure! Edith Aubrey is going round from place to place telling people that I never meant to be a substitute between you."

"She is quite right; and she might add that there never will be!" said Almy, compressing his lips, while in his eyes there sparkled a depth of quiet scorn that Payne had never before seen.

"Won't she start, though, to-morrow, when she sees you driving in Central Park, with old Parker sitting as upright as ever than a coward!" he added Payne, bursting into a laugh. "I'd give a nice little sum to see her face."

People had not got through marveling at the unaccountable enlistment of Jervis Payne when the sudden marriage of Major Almy supplied them with fresh matter for wonder. And when Private Payne, just come in from picket duty among the pine woods of Fairfax Court House camp, received a long letter containing the wedding-cards of Maurice Almy and Carrie Dewey, he guessed shrewdly at the "something else" which Maurice had gained on the eventful day when he bought his recruit.

'FALSE HOPE.

God gave me from mine enemy,
I pray we ne'er may meet again.
She has been worse than foe to me;
And yet, if we should meet again
I should believe her to my bane.

She has been worse than foe to me,
With promised love and present pain,
Till love seem'd only made for hate,
And truth was known to be in vain:
I did believe her, to my bane.

or clear eyes look'd so lovingly.
She came with such a hasty strain,
f her lips—so sweet, so sweet to me—
Left upon mine a poison bain:
I did believe her, to my bane.

She has been worse than foe to me;
Yet I should love her o'er again
If we should meet—dear Injury!
Men call her Hope—but she is Pain.
Pray God we may not meet again!

A ROMANCE OF LIMA.

Many years ago a young Englishman, a medical student named Astley, went to Lima. The love of romance was inherent in his nature, and he met with in his own country was too tame to satisfy it. Proud of the profession for which he was studying, and trusting to it for his subsistence, strong-hearted in body and in mind, he left England with a bold heart, and this was the life he led, and what came of it.

At a time when the difficulty of procuring subjects for dissection and study was very great, and when to procure them honestly was impossible, at the prejudice against dissection was so strong that no one was willing to submit his body or any one connected with him to examination, it is well known that there were men who made it their business to supply the want by stealth, making use, in place of the newly-buried, which they sold to surgeons, medical students, or indeed to any one who stood in need of the ghastly commodity.

This class, known as "body snatchers" and "resurrectionists," has died out, and society is happily now little prejudice against what has been triumphantly proved to be a necessary branch of scientific study; but at the time of our story their hideous work was a thriving and profitable one.

Richard Astley, in common with the rest of the professional students of his time, was careless, and many times in the black night his door was opened to those who did not knock, but who were expected and waited for, and who, entering silently, stealthily deposited a dread burden upon the table prepared for its reception. Old and young, men, women, and children, all in turn lay upon that grim table, and Astley's skilful instruments cut their way to secrets that were destined to benefit the living.

Though he was not hard-hearted, it was not unnatural that in time he should grow so much accustomed to the sight of his fellow-men as to feel nothing but a momentary pity as he put aside the clustering curls of inferior, or uncovered the face of a man struck down in the glory of his years.

One night, as many nights before, the stealthy visit was paid, and Archy took his lamp to examine the new subject. Neither strong man nor tender child this time, but a young and beautiful woman. The dead face was so lovely that it did not seem possible that light in the closed eyes, and color in the pale lips and cheeks, could make it lovelier. The fair hair had fallen back, and gave no shade to the white brow, and the long fair lashes lay in a thick fringe upon the violet-tinted underlids.

She was very tall and slender, and her hands—one of which hung down as she lay upon the table —were long and gracefully shaped. As Astley lifted the hand to look at her head, he thought how beautiful it must once have been, since now, when there was not the faintest rose-tint to relieve the deathly pallor of it, it was so exquisite. She wore one garment, a long flannel shroud, very stealthy made, through which scanty drapery the outline of the slender limbs was distinctly visible, and below which her delicate feet were seen, bare to the ankle.

Astley was troubled as he had never been before. The idea of treating this beautiful corpse as he had done all others brought to him in like manner was repulsive to him, and he recoiled from it as from the thought of sacrilege. But how could he rid himself of the lovely incubus? It was possible that the man who had brought it might be induced to take it back again, and if they should refuse—but he was incapable of distinct thought upon the subject, and could only determine that in any case the beautiful thing before him should be treated with reverence and respect. He gently covered it from head to foot with a long white cloth, and locking the door of communication between his bedroom and that in which it lay, threw himself upon his bed without undressing, for the night was nearly gone.

But his sleep was broken, and his dreams were feverish, and in some way all connected with what lay in the next room. Now it seemed to him that a gifted fairy, with the locked door, with hands folded on its breast, and eyes still fast closed, and stood by his bedside, and put on the dress was that he had opened a vein in one of the delicate arms, and that warm, living blood poured fast from it, and finally he awoke with a cry of horror from a ghastly dream that he had entered the room, and found that some unknown hand had anticipated him in the work of dissection.

The horror was upon him after he woke to know it was a dream, and opening the door he looked in upon the dead. No change there of any kind. The long sheeted figure lay in the half light of dawn as he had seen it in the lamplight, very straight and still.

It was not until nearly noon that Astley raised the covering to look once again upon the beautiful dead, and when he did so he saw with wonder that unmixed with terror, that a change had come upon it. The dead had not till what it might be; the deathly pallor was there still, but in some way the face was not the same. He looked into it long and curiously, and saw a change had passed over the eyes, for though they were still fast shut, they looked now as though closed in sleep rather than in death. He lifted an eyelid tenderly with his finger; there was not death in the eye; unconsciousness, trance, there might be, but not death.

He was certain now that she was not dead, though he could find no life in her pulses. For hours he strove to call back the spirit, until at last the room returned, and warmth, and life, and she lay before him sleeping tranquilly like a child. He had placed her on his bed, and sat by her side with a throbbing heart to await her awakening.

She slept so long, and in the waning light looked so pale that he feared she was again about to fall into the strange deathly trance from which he had with so much difficulty recovered her. In his terror of that he could not for her to wake, and the sound of his cry awoke her with a start.

He had prepared a speech that was to calm and reassure her when she woke bewildered, but he found self so strangely clothed and lodged; but she no more needed calming and reassuring than an infant too young to know the meaning of fear. The woman. She looked round with a wondering gaze that was almost childlike, and her eye resting upon Astley she sat up in the bed and asked him in his own language for food. It was evident that she had no recollection of illness, and another anxiety nor curiosity as to her present position.

She ate the food which was brought to her with appetite, and would have risen from the bed, apparently unconscious that she wore no garment but a shroud, had not Astley persuaded her to lie down and sleep again.

He left her sleeping, and went to another room profoundly puzzled. Here was living beauty in woman, ignorant, and almost helpless as a child, thrown upon him for protection, as it was clear that she did not remember any thing which would lead to the discovery of her friends. It was possible that her senses had left her altogether, never to return; the lovely creature might be a harmless idiot for the rest of her days. Her speaking English was another puzzle. She might be an Englishwoman—her beauty was certainly of the Saxon type—or she might only have learned the English language; but if so, how came that knowledge to have been retained when all else seemed gone?

His perplexity was interrupted by the entrance of the cause of it. She stood at the door wrapped round in one of the bed coverings, looking at him with a sweet, childish, vacant expression that was touching in its helplessness. "I want to tell you something," he thought, as she stood apparently waiting for him to speak; "her name shall be Mary."

"Are you better, Mary, and will you sit in this chair?"

She paid no attention to the inquiry, but took the offered seat, and began silently rocking herself to and fro. It had such a ghastly effect to see her there by the lamplight, robed in the long white drapery, with her beautiful face still pale, though no longer deathly, rocking herself in silence, that Astley felt a sensation very like fear thrill through him. He must do something, for he could not bear this. He took up a book, the first that came to hand—it was an English one—and offered it to her, asking if she would like to read.

She took it with a childlike smile, and laying it open upon her knees began to flutter the leaves backward and forward, playing idly with them.

"Good Heaven!" said Astley to himself, "she is mad, imbecile at any rate; I must do something with her."

But it was impossible to think with her before him, and, taking her by the hand, he said;

"Now, Mary, you must go back to bed, to-morrow—"

She did not wait for the end of the sentence, but rose at once to do as she was bidden, threw down the book, and letting fall the coverlet that had enveloped her, walked quietly back to the inner room.

Astley fastened the door, and felt as if he were going mad from sheer bewilderment. She must have clothes the very first thing, and now she knew they lay in the room without taking none into his confidence? Even if he knew where to go for them, he knew nothing of what a woman's clothes should be. It was evident then that some one must be told of the extraordinary adventure, and it was equally evident that it must not be a person to whom he could be ashamed to confess, or who would be afraid to practical help of a kind no man could give him.

The matter was discussed before he could arrange any settled plan, and finally he decided that he could not if he would rid himself of the charge of her, therefore he must keep her in his house, and he would tell all to the woman who acted as his housekeeper, who chanced to be absent at the time, but who might be now returning. But very day. He would bind her to secrecy by the most solemn oath he could devise, and if she refused to keep it—he would be now in a terrible scrape, and this seemed the best thing to be done. The woman knew nothing, in the day, of the mystery locked all, and implored her assistance. To his great relief she agreed at once to do all that lay in her power for the unfortunate. After the first arrangements made, Astley left the house for the day, determined to shake off the unpleasant impression which the whole thing had made upon him.

Returning at night he found Mary comfortably clothed, and looking less pale and ill. His housekeeper told him that she had succeeded exactly like a child, having apparently no idea of assisting herself at all.

It would be impossible to describe minutely how intelligence dawned and grew swiftly in the poor girl's mind. It was not a process resembling that in fancy, but came in fitful snatches. The greatest change came first, when her face brightened from its sweet, listless expression at the sound of Astley's approach, and then she began to wait upon him like a loving child. He devoted himself to her very tenderly, almost as a mother might devote her to her child, and with infinite patience taught her to read and to write. She learned also to sew, and was never tired of working at anything, but what he taught her was learned quickest, best.

Two years passed, and Mary had developed so rapidly that she was equal with other women in knowledge and acquirements, but she had no memory. Astley had given her a name, and she had for the whole story, and urged her to try to recall something of the time before; but it was in vain, her memory would not serve her. At one time this was so happy that they cared little for the past. She was something belonging so entirely to him, even her life owed to him its safety, and lived him so intensely, there being no one in the world whom she knew or loved beside, that he could not fail to see that her affection for him was of the kind that is between them enhanced its charm.

They were married, and still she lived in the same privacy as before, her husband and his love sufficed for every thing, and she shrank from entering a world which she knew nothing of. Astley's acquaintance had long ago decided that if he was not mad, he was at least eccentric enough to make his own arrangements, and they left him to live by, only, leaving him none but a professional circle. He had the reputation of being skilful, and his practice was a large one; his gains were more than he were devoted to his home, which was his heaven.

Two more years passed, years of the most perfect happiness. Mary's memory was nothing from other women, save for that blank existence of more than twenty years. Astley's memory of her was perfect and unstirred. She lived entirely within doors. Astley had one evening taken her for a walk, and had been thrown into sight of a crowd of the poor, and had terrified her so much that he never repeated the experiment.

All time is hanging to introduce his beautiful wife to his old friends and relatives in England was very strong, but the difficulties of explanation, or of secrecy, which he could not bear to practise with her, extreme aversion to the project, always prevailed, and the idea was dismissed as the thing was impossible.

Six years had passed since the eventful night when Mary had been brought dead to Astley's door, when walking one day in the streets of the city, he met an old friend whom he had not seen since his marriage—Holt England. The recognition was mutual, and Astley insisted upon his friend's returning with him to dinner. The invitation was cordially given and heartily accepted. Holt, returning to surprise Mr. Holt by the sudden sight of his wife's loveliness, he said nothing of his being married, judging to himself with his astonishment would be when he saw her.

Though he had anticipated some evidence of surprise, he was quite unprepared for the excess of emotion displayed by Mr. Holt upon his introduction to Mrs. Astley. The color left his face for a moment, and then returning violently dyed it crimson, and the words of acknowledgment were stammered out almost unintelligibly. Astley lost his composure by a strong effort he offered his arm to lead Mrs. Astley to dinner, but she quietly declined it, laying her hand upon her husband's. During the whole time of dinner Mr. Holt scarcely moved his eyes from Mary's face, who did not seem at all disturbed by his intense gaze, and took no notice of her guest beyond what hospitality demanded.

Astley's suspicions were excited long before the meal was concluded, and his heart took a jealous leap as he thought it possible that his friend was falling in love with his beautiful wife. He cursed the impulse which had led him to bring Holt home with him, and busily invented excuses for ridding himself of his guest as soon as was possible.

Holt's agitation increased to positive illness before long, and rising, he asked Astley to accompany him to another room. He was scarcely able to walk, and Astley took him by the arm and asked if he were ill.

"Ill!" he groaned. "I wish I were dead."

He sat down and covered his face with his hands.

"You'll think me a fool, Astley, but the likeness of your wife to mine has overcome me."

"Are you married, then?" said Astley. "I did not know."

"I was married eight years ago. I married an English girl with your wife's hair and eyes; her height, too, and with her sweet voice. I brought her over here directly after our marriage, and we lived the happiest life in the world for two years—and then she died."

Astley was silent. He could think of no words of consolation that would not be a mockery to a man who had lost his wife as he had.

"Died," Holt continued, after a pause, "while I was away from her. I had gone a three-days' journey for my health, and returned to find that she had died suddenly immediately after my departure, and was already buried."

"How long ago?" asked Astley, hoarsely. A horrible light was breaking in upon him.

"Six years. I left home on Thursday day. I never even visited her grave, but returned to England at once; and now, after these years, I find your wife to be like her in every feature that my old wound is torn open afresh, and the intolerable anguish has made me cry out in this way."

It should be added that he laid his hand upon his friend's shoulder with a grasp like a vice. His voice was harsh and dry, and his eyes were bloodshot and glaring.

"Holt, for God's sake let us do nothing rashly! Come with me to your wife's grave, and let us be very sure."

Holt looked up and saw all in Astley's face.

"Speak, I say, Astley! this is my wife! Tell me how you met her; speak quickly while I can bear you, for there is the sound of a cataract in my ears that deafens me."

And he fell in a swoon at Astley's feet.

He might have died in it for all Astley could do to revive him. He sat, with blindly staring at the pale face, but was incapable of so much as holding out a hand to him.

And he did tell him, sparing nothing; saying plainly out that she had been brought to him by some unknown hand, and that she had lain like a dead upon his table for a night, sheeted and shrouded like a corpse.

"And you believe her," burst in Holt, who was almost beside himself.

"I saved her life," said Astley, "and she is as sofeet and pure as that of that creation. —"I you come with me to the grave that we may be very sure."

"No, no, no," Holt moaned; the fury was passing away, and giving place to a dull sorrow. "I believe you, Astley, but as certain, more certain than death, that your wife is mine. God help us!"

Which of the man was the most to be pitied?

There were many minutes of horrible silence, in which each heard the beating of his heart like a heavy drum. Holt spoke again.

"I ought to come here. Surely she can not have forgotten me."

"Mary—I tell me! Mary—" It will only distress her." I grieve to say word of horror she has no memory of any thing before the trance."

But when he saw the passion in Holt's face he judged it best to tell him that she should come. Since he chose to hear from her own mouth what he had refused to believe from his friend's, he should do so.

She came quickly at the sound of the loved voice and glided into the room, and with an angel's peace between two evil spirits. She stopped short as she caught sight of Astley's face all drawn and white, with the effort to suppress his emotion, and then threw her arms round his neck with a cry of love and terror.

But he unwound her arms, and for the first time drew back from her embrace.

"Mary, my love—Holt's eyes flashed fire at the terrible words and tone—"tell me, tell Mr. Holt, if you remember any thing in your life before you awoke from your trance at this house?"

"I do not," she said; "I remember nothing. I have said so many times."

"Swear it," cried Holt.

"I swear it," she said, "by my husband, Richard Astley."

Poor Holt! He threw himself at her feet, clasping her knees, and crying passionately:

"Oh, Ethlin! have you forgotten me, your husband, Ewald Holt? Oh, my darling, you must remember me, and how happy we were for that short two years!"

But she broke from his grasp, and threw herself into Astley's arms, crying out:

"Send it m away! Send it m away! She was pale and trembling with terror.

"Let her go!" shouted Holt, or by—"

The oath was interrupted by Astley.

"Holt, God knows I will try to do what is right, and for her sake I ask you to be calm." He placed her in a chair, where she sat weeping for very fright, and went on.

"You shall say all you can to bring the past to her memory, and if she can remember you in the faintest degree I will give up my claim to yours. But if she does not—oh, Holt, I have been rich!" The struggle was an awful one, and shook him as the wind shakes a reed.

"You tell her," said Holt, bitterly; "perhaps she will believe what you say. At any rate, she will listen to it."

It was hard to begin the cruel task; yet for her sake he undertook it, his voice trembling, though the truth still in his will to study it.

"Mary, love, listen. You know that you must have lived more than twenty years before you were brought here that night—"

"I do not know," she said; "I can not remember."

But it must have been so, for you were a woman then."

"I can not understand," she repeated, have no recollection of any thing before."

Astley turned to Holt with a look of agony. "You see how it is; let us end this torture."

"Give me my wife!" said Holt, fiercely.

"You will not take her," Astley cried, as the thought of his doing so against her will struck him for the first time.

"She is mine," said Holt. "Go on; tell her the whole story. If she does not understand, she will believe it when you tell it to her." The sneer with which the words were spoken was a cruel one, but Astley had much need of fortitude, and scarcely knew what he said or did.

And Astley told her all in a few words we looked bewildered.

"It must be true if you say so, but I can not recollect; and, oh, Astley, I love only you."

"She must come with me," shouted Holt, savagely. The demon had got the better of him, and the poor woman, mad with jealous pain, spoke bitter and unjust words, that made the terrified woman clung more closely to Astley for protection.

The scene must be ended for her sake, and Astley besought Holt to leave them till the next day, when, if they could but decide upon what was right, it should be done. For her sake, too, he consented to plead with the frantic man; and seeing that Mary had retired to the inner room, he laid her down, and led Holt from the room, that the sight of her might no longer madden him. His rage died out from simple exhaustion, and throwing himself into a chair he wept like a child.

Astley roused him. "Holt, be a man. This is an awful trial, but I wish to Heaven I had died rather than played my part in it. There are not upon the earth two men so broken-hearted as you and I. Let us exercise all our fortitude, and let us spare what anguish we can to that unhappy woman. Leave me now, and to-morrow I will see you again."

Holt rose from his seat. "I have been a brute, I," he said, as he turned to go.

Astley felt that his grief was but begining, when he tried to explain the whole thing clearly to Mary. The torture of putting it into words was so intense that all before was nothing compared with it. And when at length she comprehended, and asked him if he wished her to leave him, even that question, with slight comprehension of what he endured in telling her that he believed she ought to do so.

Loving as she was, she could not comprehend the sacrifice to duty which Astley was striving to make, and her thorough ignorance of the world rendered it impossible to make her understand what her position would be if she remained where she was. And yet this was the case—as Astley tried to persuade him on no extraordinary, so different from any thing that had ever been in the world before, that no law, human or divine, could apply to it. Mary was silent, and the thought rose dominant, that by whatever mystery of unconsciousness deprived of memory, she was his wife. She looked at him, and with this thought piercing him like a sharp sword, he said that he believed she ought to leave him.

She rose, cold and pointed in a moment, and would have left him then, but at the threshold her spirit failed, and she turned again to throw herself into his arms and sobs.

Night has veiled many sights of woe, the clouds of night and morning times have gathered in sights of anguish, bitter cries for faith and patience, going up above the stars right to the feet of God, but night never shrouded deeper woe than this, bitterer cries never pierced the shuddering darkness.

When morning dawned they were both very calm and quiet. Mary was gone, and Astley knew that eyes were dry. He had decided for the right, though his heart was broken in the conflict; and he had fought and had conquered. He had not deserted it was so, but because he said it was so.

"I shall die," she said, in a voice from which all pain had departed. "I can bear no more and live, but I can bear even this and die."

"You can bear more," said Astley. When the sun set, it would upon Astley broken-hearted and alone. Holt had taken away his wife.

Astley was right, and Astley never left his desolate home. He made no distinction of day or night, but lay down to sleep—if the stupor which from time to time fell upon him unconsciously could be so called—at any hour that sleep came to him.

At the close of the seventh day he tried for the first time to look his fate boldly in the face. "I am not dead," he said, "therefore it is clear that this grief will not kill me." That night he undressed and went to bed.

The night six years ago, when the sheeted figure lay upon the table, and he dreamed fantastic dreams of terror connected with it, came to mind more distinctly than it had ever done before. His sleep was broken and feverish, and haunted by wild dreams. Twice he awoke feeling certain that he had heard a knocking at the door, and twice he slept again when he found that all was silent. But the awoke a third time in the gray dawn and heard the sound again, a feeble knocking at the door. He was awake enough now to be conscious that it was not a dream. He rose, determined to see what was the cause; he unbarred and opened the door, and there fell forward across the threshold the dead body of Mary.

CHAPTER LIV.

LOVE AND GRATITUDE.

THE secret which the little bird whispered to Lily perplexed and agitated her very much.

She had noticed of late in her mother's fortunes, but ascribed it to the popularity of her performances in the circus and the liberality of Mr. M'Variety, the manager. The little bird told her quite another story. It told her that the dainty white bedroom had been furnished for her by Sir William Long. It was easy to infer from this that the Cottage, the renewed engagement, the increase of her mother's salary, the handy, and by no elegant supper, all came from the same quarter.

For whose sake had the baronet spent so much money, and taken so much trouble? For her mother's? Lily would fain have let her heart answer this question in the affirmative, but try as she would she could not impose that conviction upon herself. Something—some still small voice of the past—told her that it was not for her mother's sake that the baronet had done all these things, but for her own.

Lily strove to think that it was done in pity for her hard life and forlorn condition; that it was simply the act of a generous and sympathizing nature. But while she struggled to interpret his motives in this wise, her heart was against it a suspicion that filled her with a vague feeling of dread.

Could it be possible that Sir William Long loved her?

That was the question which strove to shape itself in her mind. But Lily repressed it, and kept it down, thinking to have no answer. And this she did to guard the image which sat enthroned in her breast—the image of Edgar Greyfound. But the question would not down again, and shaped itself definitely, and demanded to be answered; and Lily, still hesitating, went back over the weary life to the Greyfound manner. She had so few remembrances of pleasant days, that she was not likely to forget that day. It arose in her memory sharp and clear—a bright green island in the midst of a great waste of waters. She remembered sitting on the knee of Sam Long's knee; she recalled the kind things he said to her, and how happy she felt at being near him. But she had never thought of him from that time until this moment, she might have forgotten how he looked, where they sat, what kind things he said to her, and many other little particulars of the occasion. But she had thought of him often, and carried him forward on every new page of the ledger of her life up to the day when she wrote the name of Edgar Greyfound upon it. She thought of him well, and gentleman less frequently after that; but she had thought of him so often before that his image was indelibly stamped upon her memory. She remembered every thing; how he had laughed and chatted with her, and asked her her name, and inquired how old she was. She remembered his prefacing the apple and throwing the peel over his shoulder, and saying that it would form the initial of her sweetheart's name; how he had put her on the carpet in the shape of a W, and how she clapped her hands and said she should like to be his little wife, and make him a pair of worsted muffatees for the winter. And she remembered his stooping down and kissing her on the forehead, and saying, "I hearthy wish you were my little sister, or my little daughter." Last of all, she remembered that she was eight years of age then, and he twenty-eight.

So far as Lily knew, she was now in her twentieth year. And Sir William? Sir William was forty!

When Lily had worked out this little sum, and saw the figures swaying her in the air, she closed her eyes against them, as if by so doing she could shut out the reflections to which they gave rise.

She went back over her recollections of the Greenwich dinner again, and always when she came to those parting words her heart was relieved: "I heartily wish you were my little sister, or my daughter."

When Madame Ernestine was at the circus rehearsing a new act of the haute-école for her benefit, Lily retired from room to room, always thinking, thinking, thinking. Every object upon which her eyes rested was as dreary, and miserable, and forlorn as her own heart. Looking from the windows of the Cottage through the parting rain, she saw the leafless trees nodding at her like gibbering spectres; the weeping meadow bare and gaunt, overhanging the seats and tables, upturned, under like huge skeleton insects waiting to crush the votaries of pleasure in their grip. Through the mist and drizzle of the winter's day the Thames flowed over-beds brimful nor sight like graves, of which the dripping, dirtbegrimed stones were the head-stones, sacred to the memory of drowned flowers, which seemed to have died without issue. The Muscovite illusion had in part been rudely dispelled by the winter's wind, but a portion of the snow of the Kremlin had been blown down, and the gap revealed some stacks of South London chimneys, smoking dismally, and dropping tears of soot upon the dingy gables.

One day, when Lily was looking out upon this dreary scene, wondering if those trees would ever again be covered with leaves; if those scrubs and stumps in the beds would ever again rise from their sepulchres crowned with the glory of flowers, wondering if her own heart would ever throb to an emotion of joy, she saw the figure of a man looming through the mist, and approaching the Cottage. As the figure came nearer, Lily recognized Mr. Kafooze.

Taking him in his most favorable aspect, Mr. Kafooze was not a cheerful person to look upon. In a pretty picture the most indulgent critic would have regarded him as a blemish. Under the present circumstances an ordinary observer would have viewed him in the light of an additional horror—a bat that had flitted across the sky, or an owl that had suddenly perched upon a bare and guarded branch to complete the dismal picture. But to poor Lily the lean wizened figure of the manager was a thing of joy. Here was his coming was an angel's visit; for she knew that he had a feeling heart, and he was one of the very few persons who had ever spoken kindly to her.

The conduct of Mr. Kafooze was mysterious. He approached the Cottage, and disappeared from Lily's sight, leading her to address her that he was in the porch knocking for admission. Subsequently he located in sight again, and walked about in front of the Cottage, looking up, and shading his eyes with his hand. Any one but Lily would have characterized Mr. Kafooze's conduct as "prowling;" but Lily soon perceived that he was trying to attract some person's attention. And who could that person be but herself?

She tapped at the window, and beckoned to him to come in; and, assured by this, Mr. Kafooze went round and entered the porch. Lily ran down stairs immediately, and opened the door. Mr. Kafooze dry was not precisely an embodiment of happiness; but Mr. Kafooze wet was a monument of misery which left no room for depth to be reached. It would have been hard to give an appropriate idea of the appearance of his appearance, without calling in the illustrative services of the "drowned rat."

"Oh, do come in, Mr. Kafooze, out of the rain," Lily said.

"No, thank you, my dear," said the astrologer. "—I—I will wait here till the rain has finished presently, and I shouldn't like her to see me here."

"But you will get wet through, Mr. Kafooze," blended Lily.

"Oh, never mind, my dear; the wet doesn't hurt me. I'm used to it," said the astrologer. "I've been used to it all my life. It there's a shower of rain coming, I'm sure to be out in it without an umbrella. It's my star, my dear. I was born under a bad aspect of Aquarius, with Scorpio in opposition. Under such circumstances you're sure to forget your umbrella, even if it wasn't full of holes and three ribs broken. No, never mind me, my dear, but please to say a word. I've been looking back, my dear, among my books, with the data you gave me, and I have cast your star."

It's very good of you to take so much trouble," said Lily.

"No, not at all, my dear; I like it. I'm never so happy as when I am studying the stars. Well, my dear, if you were born under a bad horoscope, you're all right, for I've sent a little further, and found that though in Leo at that time, he was passing out of that sign and entering into Virgo

"If ever the devil had a daughter," said the manager, as he crossed the garden, "you're she, for certainty."

Madame Ernestine's temper did not obey the law of ordinary violent disorders. It was at all times sharp, but never short. When she had run up the crescendo scale to the highest note in the gamut of fury she went back and repeated the same exercise again and again, with an increase rather than a diminution of brilliant execution. She fumed and stormed all the afternoon, and, when she walked home, no fire circus to begin her performance the thunder was still rumbling.

As she was entering the circus she met Lord Carlton. She received herself immediately, and saluted him smilingly gayly:

"Ah, milord, how do you do? You have come to honor me with your presence, I perceive. It is very gracious of you."

"Oh, not at all," his lordship replied, "beauty and talent always command my homage. It would have been impossible for me to stay away on such an occasion."

"Your lordship is most flattering," said the countess, with a grin. "By-the-way," she added, "your lordship honored me with a charming present, this riding-whip."

"A bagatelle," said his lordship.

"Oh, not at all," said the countess. "I value it very much. I have not seen its fellow; but I shall use it for the first time to-night, on the occasion of my benefit."

"You do me honor," said his lordship.

"You are very kind to say so, milord—but excuse-me, it is time that I go and dress. Shall I have the honor of your lordship's company to supper in my humble chateau?"

"Certainly," said his lordship; "it will give me great pleasure."

"Then adieu pour le moment," said the countess; "we shall meet at supper."

She encountered old Kafooze in the passage leading to her dressing-room. She was not so gracious to him.

"Ah! ganache, ogre, corbeau, oiseau de mauvais augure! what did you say? that I should have no luck? Ah! and she struck at the old man with her whip. Old Kafooze sprang, aside with wonderful agility, but did not avoid the blow. The whip came down a little across one of his shoulders, and made him writhe; but he said never a word, and slunk away as fast as he could, pausing at all down to Scorpio in that bad conjunction with Aquarius.

Mr. M'Cawber involved a true prophet. The fine bright weather brought the people out, and the gardens were well filled, considering that it was the winter season. The workmen, however, were soon tired of promenading among the ten thousand extra lamps, whose brilliancy only tended to make the wretchedness of the gardens more visible, and crushed into the circus in a body the moment the doors were opened. The circle and amphitheatre were soon filled. Little by little and by little the fashionable world began to drop into the boxes. The Duke of Long has there in a by himself, looking solemn and thoughtful. Greyfaunt was in the box adjoining, yawning and looking inexpressibly bored by the performance of the Swiss Shepherdess. Lord Carlton had settled himself to sleep at once. Fashion was there also, and Mr. Thomas Tibbs, and many more, who came, not for the sake of patronizing Madame Ernestine, but to be in the same train with Milord Carlton and Sir William Long.

The blank, listless countenances of these superior persons, relieved with a constant round of pleasure, presented a remarkable contrast to the bright happy expectant faces that glistened under the lamps in the amphitheatre. In the eyes of those humble folks, who had worked hard for the shilling they had paid at the door, every thing was delightful, beautiful, charming. The Shepherdess in her flowered muslin skirt, with her crook, dancing and skipping upon the back of a saddle, hailed by Mr. Edgar Greyfaunt as a "scrangy fright," was to them an aerial creature belonging to another sphere; the Turkish Graces were real divinities in petticoats, exciting the admiration of the male sex by the exquisite shape of their legs, and the pinkness of their complexions; and of the female sex—especially those of a domestic turn, who did their washing at home—by the perfection exhibited in the starching of their petticoats; Young Smuggler hitching up his trousers-straps, and looking somewhat like a Proteus onion, was a prodigy of daring and genius; the clowns with their old old jokes and antic gambols; the manager of the circus with his curly hair, his black mustache, and his hussar's jacket; the Frenchified looking grooms in the back ranks; the strong man who appeared to admit the horses—all these persons were objects of the most boundless admiration, not unmixed with awe. Hundreds of spectators in the daring of Young Smuggler, alternated with roars of boisterous laughter at the witticisms of the clown. These simple-minded shilling people thoroughly bent upon enjoyment, were pleased even to applaud the scent of the stable, as it was wafted into the circus by the motion of the curtains, that scent which caused Mr. Edgar Greyfaunt to utter many expressions of disgust, and to fan himself with his perfumed handkerchief.

Mr. Edgar Greyfaunt, voting all this intolerably slow and stupid, had strolled into Sir William Long's box. He was not a welcome visitor. Sir William scarcely took the trouble to return his greeting.

"What a horid bore this is!" yawned the dandy; "and then to have to sit out that dreadful old harridan, Madame Ernestine! Really, its more than one can endure. By the way, Long," he continued, "have you noticed that remarkable fellow sitting opposite? Look at him, he's the best part of the show, I think."

Sir William looked across in the direction indicated, and saw seated in one of the lower boxes a man of foreign appearance with grizzled hair, cropped very short, and eyebrows and mustache almost jet black. The dark mustache and eyebrows in contrast with his pale face and gray hair, gave the man a very singular appearance, and Sir William looked at him long and curiously.

"Quite a lusus naturæ," said the dandy: "I'll go and ask the fellow if he knows me, eh?"

Young Scrangler had concluded his Protean performance, and retired amidst a tempest of applause; and Madame Ernestine "in her Parisian attraction"—whom Mr. Thomas Tuttlesbell had picked up at the Cirque Imperial in Paris, and illustrated the writing of Victor Hugo by showing the close resemblance between a Frenchman and a monkey, leaving the tiger part of the likeness to be exhibited in the forthcoming Paris edition which they retired to wrangle over their dominoes and absinthe after the performance) the English clown had been in close communion in disparagement of foreigners; and then, after a short pause, the orchestra struck up the Marseillaise, giving warning of the approach of Madame Ernestine, the world-renowned exponent of the haute-école. The velvet curtains were drawn aside, and Madame Ernestine, erect and stately, slowly entered the arena on her chestnut steed. Sir William Long leaned his head carelessly across at the foreigner with the gray head and the black mustache. He saw the man start and turn deadly pale; he saw him spring to his feet and pale before; he saw him spring to his feet and clutch the front of the box, and then immediately sink into his seat again, and cover his face with his hands. What was this man, and what could have been the strange interest that he felt?

While Sir William was pondering upon this incident, the exposition of the haute-école began. It was the old routine, which needs no description to any thing, then the mare, tossing her neck and pawing with her right fore-foot; then, backing to the utter horror of Mr. Thomas Tibbs, and causing a half-tittering, half-screaming commotion among the people in the front seats; then prancing on her hind legs, and bowing to the audience, then cantering gently, and at last—as illustrating a buffalo-hunt in the prairies of the Far West—bolting with a jockey, Mr. Edgar Greyfaunt, was gradually warming up; and Madame was whipping up her mettlesome steed, when the people aforesaid, the men who endeavored to wage tar more forward, now with fierce impatient words, now with low and cautious whispers, to be quiet with the whip laid smartly across her haunches. Faster and more furious! Faster still, in a mad career, which, to the mind's eye of every one looking at it showers over the audience, plunging deep into the soft bed of the arena, thudding on her hind legs, and then, with a sudden jerk of the ring, snorting, panting, and reeking with a lather of sweat; round and round she went at a terrible pace, and then, suddenly and quite unbeknown, and still stimulating the mare to further exertion with tongue, and whip, and heel. Now the mare was seen to stumble, and all the mare take them at a bound, first one and then the other, plunging and rearing over the rocker, but each dead at the foot of a willow-tree on the way. A shepherd from the neighborhood was attracted by the bleating of a lamb, took it home to his wife and adopted it, and had a stone cross put up at the foot of the willow-tree in remembrance of the mother. Whether this story be true or not in all its circumstances, the substance of the curse rose to public notice. Whether it be only now or long ago of stones, and the lake of Hellenstein met his death in the famous War of the Peasants by the hands of the people of the neighborhood, whom the priests cursed the vengeance perfect, places the son of the despised Marie, who was unknown to his half-brother the count. These events are supposed to have occurred some twenty-five years before 1525, the date of the outbreak of that agitation their feudal master, Count Hugo of Hellenstein had broken his neck by a fall from the very horse at whose feet the injured Marie had thrown herself, and was succeeded by his son by the Countess Bertha, who surpassed his father in pride and luxury, as he was well enabled to do by the people with a natural daughter of the Emperor Maximilian.

M. BARDOUX, of the French Institute, has described the remains of ancient Babylon. He has just laid before the Academy the result of his experiments. His recipe is: Take a piece of brick, and soak it in water for a couple of glass, and stand it in the sun. The water soon boils, and the brick is said to be of better than if cooked in the ordinary way.

M. JOURDAN, a well-known contributor to the Siècle, says: "Reading aloud has recently appeared in fashion. In 1862, in that journal, touching the neglect of primary instruction proposed to the Senate, I had the honor to beg the gentlemen the educational advance accomplished by M. Guizot has been almost entirely destroyed since 1815, that the Legislative Assembly allowed education to fall into decay. The Senate, which was then under the influence of M. Guizot to be overturned. A republic was on the ascendant empire and the present that empire the decadence of those would be needed. The Roman Catholic Clergy at once set to work to found establishments of instance had presented to them. "The watchword," says M. Jourdan, "was Rome, and innumerable congregations, both of men and women, rose up; among them the Christian Brothers, founded by the Abbé Peter Lourdain, to get possession of the primary instruction. Napoleon III. has not only not overthrown these orders, but has taken deep root in the soil of France, quoted by the Senate, the secondary education was thrown into the hands of the Roman Catholic Clergy, and almost all the young girls of the inferior class. This army, supported by the Catholic Congregations, has now become so strong, that thirteen years, under the protection of academical councils and the law Despatel, toward the conquest of the entire generation. The number of religious women now devoted to teaching throughout France is forty thousand. Such is the system now opposed by the anti-clerical party. The poor schoolmaster," M. Jourdan goes on to say, "who on miserably paid, and crushed beneath the power and dignity of the cure, is not able to perform the meanest service at the station of the priests. They walk in the sacristy, get toll the bells, and, in many villages, dig graves. Moreover, they are as lowers of soul and drawers of water for the Church. On the other hand, the religious brothers, whose eyes fixed on Rome, are allowed to dip into the public treasury and take out as much as they can get with both hands. They have houses, public buildings, fine institutions, at their disposal, giving very little instruction in return. It is true you will find little boys and girls in very decent attitudes—their arms crossed, their eyes down—repeating, parrot-like, long prayers, the purport unintelligible. You may be seen adoring medals, images, scapularies; their most forceful of superstition, their feeble subject to the rod of coarse country girls, whom a certificate of obedience to the clerical government, or even of belief, has exempted christian freedom, or 'Frères Ignorantins.' Such is the picture of the present day, the great victims of his ingenuity the danger of its continuance, and we affirm that modern France will not have her children in the hands of the priests."

ALFIERI, often before he wrote, prepared his mind by listening to music. He had a favorite air which he always played to my mind, either in the act of bowing music or a few hours after; a circumstance which has been recorded by many others. Lord Byron had music played in a room adjoining his study. Mozart's Requiem was his favorite and solemn inspiration; and music was ever necessary to Warburton. The same remarkable which was in the poet's time emotions might have composed the inventive mind of the great critic, and the grave vision of his theoretical mysteries. A celebrated French preacher of Mussilon, who was found playing on the violin, to screw his mind up to the pitch, preparatory to his sermon, which, within the hearing of his friends before he entered the church, was his favorite mode of meditation was with his violin in his hand; for Rousseau, together would he forget himself, toying voluntarier over the strings, while his imagination, travelling the human tones, was opening all the faculties of his consciousness at the fair.

THE Atlantic Telegraph, which is to be laid next summer between England and America, was recently tested to try its strength and flexibility. It gives a length of two miles suspended, and gradually weighted till it broke, the cable breaking under an additional weight of two tons and a half. The cable selected here the weight of six thousand pounds. The cable, the spirit says, consists of a long insulating body, the jute yarn, and such separate strand as the cable was successfully tested. In addition to these experiments that the more the fibres of wire were brought to the surface of the cable, the greater was the strength, and that as an insulator gutta percha, although not so strong as hard rubber, is far more elastic, and that the cable as now manufactured will be able to bear a strain of three tons every square inch laid at the bottom of the Atlantic.

WILLIAM THE FOURTH AND DEAF EMILY.—At the first drawing-room held in Adelaide's time, William the Fourth after their coronation, Miss E. Usher was presented to the queen, and, among other things, Emily said to the King while he was Duke of Clarence, owing to his constant attendance on the queen-dowager. At the first drawing-room of presentation, however, some laxation of rules was made. A slight information to the Ayres that was always standing bar-keyed. At this the King, in his best gallantry, replied, "Oh, no, my dear, I am not deaf when there is any thing I let be owned! Why, I've known her ever since she was a baby!" And, indeed, the King's memory, placed on either cheek of the blushing girl, gave ample proof of the fact, and was a most agreeable one to the vigor of his regard. The confession of the beautiful "deaf" was received with much laughter by the royal circle present. Indeed, it turned full upon her and great was the admiration and astonishment excited in the King, who relished around the throne on this grand and stately occasion.

THE ROMANCE OF AN EARLY ENGAGEMENT.—The following romantic story is told of Lord Charles Hervey and Charles II., who officiated because the second Duke of Grafton married Anne, a little yet quite young girl, and without being consulted as to the choice, to a lady still younger than herself. Lord Charles was the grandson of the Earl of Cadogan, Marlborough's favorite general. Anne, when belonging to Naples' ambassador, was in London to conclude a gambling debt between the parents, and the children, who had been playing together, were left to their own devices. Lord Charles was then about five years from the nursery, for the ceremony. The bride was dressed in white satin, and the bridegroom in velvet. "Now by you are not going to marry me to that doddy?" Miss Anne Hervey, who was then about seven years old, replied to the contrary. Fifteen years after this event Lord Charles Hervey found from his tenants a most accomplished gentleman; but having such a very disagreeable recollection of his early engagement, he declined to offer the first night of his arrival, to the charm. There he saw a lady of the most distinguished appearance that he ever had and on being answered that she was the reigning toast of the assembly, Lord Charles Hervey was struck, and he only lived together so affectionately that one year only after the death of Lady Hervey, in 1691, she died of the numerous children of this loving pair, Lady Sarah, gave birth to Lord Hervey, who was created by the favor of George III., who had then ascended the throne, at the age of twenty-two. Lord Lord Charles married Anne, daughter of Sir Nathaniel Napier, and became the mother of a son of the most distinguished character, viz., Lord Hervey, Charles Hervey, Lord Hervey, Lord Arundel, and Lieutenant-General Sir William Napier, the latter of whom died in Portugal, in the year 1830, at the advanced age of eighty-two, and was buried. Lord Hervey married great-grandson of Charles II.

A VERY curious case occurred recently concerning the mysterious murder in Brooklyn. A young woman called upon the Coroner and testified that Mrs. Burnett, a relation of her husband, identified the clothing, even to rents and stains, which had been mended. She said she was a soldier; had recently married her; the next day got into a quarrel with her husband, and left her, and remained at to faint away. On coming to her senses the Coroner's jury on the direction of the Coroner, decided that no better addressed to Mr. Bellows, Leeds, & Co., bankers in Chatham, and had himself called at the office and left the letter-box in the Merchants Gazette, but which had never reached the husband. The police have been employed to endeavor to trace it. In answer to a letter sent to Chatham by the Coroner, a reply was received from the clerk that no letter addressed to the firm in question had been received. The police have been unable to find any trace of himself on whom behalf the inquiries were made. On receipt of the information it was found to be untrue. In consequence, the gentleman having in a moment of forgetfulness omitted to write the name of the street in the address.

A FEW weeks ago an old woman died in the small town of Bedford, in the county of Bedford, England. She was regarded by her simple neighbors as being wealthy, and a few months before her death she died in poverty. She died as she had always had her will during her lifetime, she left no will behind her, but, to the astonishment of her neighbors, what she did leave behind her was cash, bank-notes, and stock amounting in value to about ten million guilders. There were pots full of the gold and silver specimens and forgotten currencies, which had been buried for years; there was a box full of American and Australian gold pieces; coupons of which she had been cut off for a quarter of a century; while in a tin box, which might have been the domestic tea-caddy, a quarter of a million's worth of bank-notes, nearly will the accumulated dung of years.

GENERAL JAMES B. RICKETTS.

GENERAL JAMES B. RICKETTS, wounded in the battle of Cedar Creek, is a native of New York, from which State he was appointed a cadet to West Point in 1835. He graduated in 1839, with the grade of Second Lieutenant of Artillery. In 1846 he was promoted to a First Lieutenancy, and in August, 1852, was appointed Captain, having since 1849 occupied the position of Regimental Quartermaster.

General RICKETTS was wounded in the first battle of Bull Run and taken prisoner. For distinguished service in that battle he was promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General. In nearly all of the Virginia campaigns he has commanded a division. His division of the Sixth Corps was, in July, detached from the Army of the Potomac and sent to Harper's Ferry, taking part in the battle of Monocacy and in all the subsequent operations in the Shenandoah Valley. In General SHERIDAN'S absence, WRIGHT assuming command of the Army of the Valley, his place at the head of the Corps was occupied by General RICKETTS, who was wounded in the early portion of the battle on the 19th, and was for some days supposed to be in a dying condition. If his wound should indeed prove a mortal one the country will have lost a very able officer.

THE LATE BRIGADIER-GENERAL BIDWELL.

GENERAL BIDWELL.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL BIDWELL, who was killed in the recent battle of Cedar Creek, was born at Black Rock, near Buffalo, in 1818 or 1819. He prepared at an early age for the legal profession, which he afterward abandoned for mercantile pursuits. He had considerable taste for military life, and was Captain of a uniform company in Buffalo. He entered the service September 21, 1861, as Colonel of the Forty-ninth New York Volunteers, known as the Buffalo Regiment, and participated in nearly all of the Virginia campaigns. The correspondent of the World, alluding to his death, says:

"Than this noble General no officer was more beloved or more respected in the whole army. His was the form that, on that portentous evening in the Wilderness when the right of the Sixth Corps, being the right of the army, was surprised and broken, sat among the bullets upon his horse, in the language of General SEDGWICK, 'like a man of iron,' coolly directing the movements which repulsed the enemy, gave us back the field, and saved the whole Army of the Potomac from disaster. His was the brigade which, if I remember aright, silenced the first battery of the rebels at Winchester. His was the brigade which took the first five pieces of cannon at Fisher's Hill. His was the presence, his the heroic bearing, that never flinched in the ...ickest of the battle, and which always inspired ...s men, not only to duty, but to order. I visited ...m this afternoon in a house where he had been ...ovyed after his wound, and where he was dying. ...retching out a pale hand, a hand known of long friendship, a hand whose grasp was always an honor, but which was doubly precious and tender at such an hour, he said,

"'Good-by,' with the words added, 'I am going first.'

"'Indeed, indeed, General, I hope it is not so bad as that.'

"'Such a fate,' was his reply, as the shadow of more than mortal suffering passed over his face and darkened it, 'that suffering was sanctified to me by an opiate, and his death was comparatively peaceful.'

At the time of his death General RIDWELL commanded the Third Brigade, Second Division, Sixth Corps. He died at 3 P.M., October 19, 1864.

GENERAL CUVIER GROVER.

We give on page 733 a portrait of General GROVER, who lost an arm in the battle of Cedar Creek. General GROVER is a native of Maine, and graduated at West Point in 1850, with the rank of Brevet Second-Lieutenant of Artillery. At the beginning of the war he had for some time been performing military duty in Utah, but immediately on war being called and assigned to a command in the Army of the Potomac. He commanded a brigade under General HOOKER in the Peninsular Campaign. April 14, 1862, he was appointed Brigadier-General. After the Chickahominy Campaign, in which he so distinguished himself, had terminated, he was assigned to the command of a division. In the latter part of the year he was transferred to the Department of the Gulf, where he commanded a division of the Nineteenth Corps. With this command, in the following autumn, he participated in the siege of Port Hudson. In July the Nineteenth Corps was recalled to Virginia, and General GROVER, retaining his command, entered upon a new field of conflict in the Valley—a field to the glory of which he has greatly contributed. He was wounded on the 19th, while leading a charge.

BEFORE PETERSBURG AND RICHMOND.

On pages 724 and 732 we give illustrations relative to the position in front of Petersburg and Richmond. The cut on page 724 illustrates the visit made to the front, October 17, by Secretaries SEWARD and of SEWARD, accompanied by Captain BARNEY with his successor SIMEON DRAPER. These distinguished visitors, attended by Generals GRANT, HUNTER, MEADE, Chief Engineer Colonel BARNARD, and others, proceeded to the scene of the late advance made by the Army of the Potomac to the left of the Weldon Railroad. On this day they visited the excellent fort on that road named after the late lamented WADSWORTH. They enjoyed highly delighted with what they saw, and examined the fort at great length. The sketch was taken by our artist while the group of officers were standing on the bastions looking toward General WARREN's head-quarters at the "Block House."

Two illustrations given on page 732 represent General BUTLER'S HEAD-QUARTERS and the mode of SIGNALING BY TORCHES across the James River. General BUTLER'S head-quarters are in the monument furthest to the left. It is at those quarters that the signaling is observed by means of a telescope. The moment when the high signal-lantern on the other side of the river are read by the sergeant or officer at the telescope, and the reply is signaled by the man with the torch.

THE DIAMOND BRACELETS.

THE evening of the 15th of February, 183—, was a gala night in Paris. "Don Giovanni" was to be performed at the opera by an assemblage of talent rarely announced for one night, even at the opera-house of Paris or in the great opera of "Don Giovanni." Words are not the names for the excitement that most attracted the attention as one read the bills—nobler and more celebrated names caught the eye. The two sons of the reigning king, and queen—Louis Philippe and Marie Amélie. The only amusement that they would keep from the people with their presence on that evening. They had been but a short time restored to their native land, and this was the first appearance at the opera since the "three days" of July had placed them on the throne; for this reason as many Orleanists as could obtain tickets had secured them for the opera of the 15th February to hear "Don Giovanni" and to see their king and queen. About six o'clock carriages were to be seen entering that gaily decorated court-yard to the classic building. An unusually handsome equipage was at the door of a large house in the Rue du Champs Elysées, evidently also for the purpose of taking some fashionables to the opera. This carriage and horses belonged to the Baron de L——, who was just then standing at the bottom of the noble staircase inside the mansion, calling playfully to his wife, telling her that the carriage was waiting.

"I'm coming, I'm coming," was the answer to this appeal. "don't be in such a hurry!"

As the last piece of advice was proffered the pretty little woman stood at the top of the stairs.

She was a dark beauty of about one and twenty, and was dressed purely in white. She came fluttering down stairs, chattering meanwhile to her handsome husband, who stood looking admiringly at her.

"Now I'm quite ready, so please don't scold. I've only got my bracelets to put on, and those I want you to clasp for me. Here's the one, if you'll take them out, and here's my wrist. Now, suppose I were to lose them in the crowd, what would our good mother say?"

A smile was the only answer the baron vouchsafed, as he took the bracelets out of their case and clasped them on the fair white arm of his bride.

They were very costly, being each composed of three rows of valuable table diamonds, while in the centre of either glittered a spray of heart's-ease, artistically formed of smaller diamonds. The bracelets were rendered more precious to their possessor by the fact of their having been in the De V—— family for three generations. They now by right belonged to the dowager baroness, but she had insisted on giving them to her son for his bride, who therefore wore them on such occasions as the one we are describing.

The Baron and Baronne de V—— stepped into their carriage, and in a few minutes were entering their box at the opera. The house was already full, although it still wanted fifteen minutes to the time announced for the overture to begin. At length the members of the orchestra took their places, and the peculiar, subdued sound of tuning stringed instruments was heard. Still the royal box was empty, and all eyes were turned toward it in eager expectation. At the moment applause burst from the pit and gallery and the entire house, as Louis Philippe and Queen Marie Amélie, attended by a large suite of officers and ladies and gentlemen of the court, appeared. The king and queen bowed graciously in return for the plaudits given, and then took their seats, at which the rest of the company did the same, and the overture commenced.

The opera was just beginning, and all seemed to take a lively interest in all around her. She not only gazed at the stage, but the boxes also came in for a share of her observation and remark.

Suddenly she bent slightly forward and looked in the direction of a box that contained the suite of young Baronne de V——. The latter was leaning forward, her right hand raised, a finger of which touched one of the bracelets that had been presented in the fate of "Don Giovanni," and quite absorbed in the beautiful music.

The young wife looked at the queen's gesture, and was aware that she had observed his wife, and when the queen turned away he laughingly told her of the fair observation, and that she had made such absurdities.

The truth of what her husband had said, however, soon forced itself on her mind, for at that moment an officer, dressed in the same uniform as those attending the royal party, drew the curtain behind their box, and stepping forward, said, "Pardon, madame, but her majesty's admiration and curiosity have been excited by the sight of the beautiful bracelets you wear, that she has commissioned me to come and request you to spare me one for a few moments for her inspection." With a low bow the baroness blushed, looked up to her husband for his approval, then unclasped one of the bracelets and handed it to the officer, following it with her head at the attention and distinction the queen had conferred on her.

The last act of the opera began, and at length the last scene ended, yet the bracelet was not returned. Another act, and another scene and bracelet less forgotten it, and the baron said he would go and make inquiries concerning it. He did so, and in a few moments returned, though without the bracelet.

"Adèle," said he to his wife, "it is very strange, but not seeing the queen in any part of the house, I asked one of the others, who has been in the royal box the whole evening, and has your bracelet with his mother and sister."

The baronne looked aghast. "Français," she said, "that man must have been an impostor. He was no officer, he had an air of thief."

The baron smiled as his little wife jumped so speedily at such a conclusion, and persisted that the bracelet was safe in the hands of some lady of the queen, and that the officer whom he had consulted was ashamed.

But woman's penetration had guessed rightly, as the morrow proved.

As the baron's fear was not forthcoming the next morning, M. de V—— spoke to the Chief Inspector of the police on the subject, who quite coincided with the baron's opinion that the bracelet had not been received by the queen, and promised that the police person who should restore it. The inspector promised to do all in his power toward the recovery of the bracelets as soon as he had the property in charge as the satisfaction of his employers.

Last three months passed away, and 1850 francs had been spent in advertising—and still the missing bracelet was not found.

It was generally said one evening in May, when a certain informed Madame de V—— that monsieur the Inspector wished to speak to her or monsieur the Baron. As the latter was out, Madame de V—— went down stairs to speak to the inspector, with whom she had had many previous interviews on the subject of the bracelets. As she was in the act of handing to the inspector a large envelope, addressed to the baron, he entered the room, and then took their seats, at which the rest of the company did the same, and the overture commenced.

The opera was just beginning, and all seemed to take a lively interest in all around her. She not only gazed at the stage, but the boxes also came in for a share of her observation and remark.

Suddenly she bent slightly forward and looked in the direction of a box that contained the suite of young Baronne de V——

Constitution Life Syrup

HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered incurable incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigation of the liberal-minded and scientific to cure which have so paralled at the present day.

During the past five years we have contended with obstacles, and everyone opposition, as herculean as we ever encountered by any enterprise.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanency, and think that disease can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

Our reply is that by health the body, like a well-balanced scale, is in a state of equilibrium. But when, from any cause, destroys one side of the scale, we have the effect of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) DISEASES transmitted from PARENT TO CHILD.

PARALYSIS.

It is an universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the various forms of PARALYSIS, that we need not exhaustn that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

INDIGESTION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, BLOODLESSNESS.

SCROFULA

STRUMA, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, ULCERATIONS, SALT RHEUM.

This taint (HEREDITARY and ACQUIRED), filling life with untold misery, is, by all usual medical remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

[ARTHRITIS], LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, THE BOLOGNESE.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the sovereign, it is in Rheumatism and its kindred effections. The most intense pains are almost instantly alleviated—enormous swellings are reduced. Cases, chronic or violent, of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by us.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Forces the poison quickly from all the cell effects of MERCURY, removing the foul Breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. Scrofulous Spongy Gums, and ulcerous Sore Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Disease of the Skin, like

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other difficulties of this kind, which so much disfigure the external appearance of both sexes, and Scrofula, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever proved its equal.

Moth Patches upon the female face, depending upon a diseased state of the Liver, are very speedily made to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will restore the secretion, and remove the deposit, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the LIVER, giving rise to Jaundice, Biliousness, Weak Stomach, or an alienated or cancerous condition of that organ, accompanied with burning or other unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

Constitution Life Syrup.

AS a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of all.

RICH BLOOD

Produces healthy men and women; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result. Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

PINEAPPLE CIDER,

IS A PREVENTIVE OF SICKNESS.—The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years, convinces him that it is time the public had an article of cider that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a sick person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it prevents sickness. It is better for a person not better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick than to pay twenty or twenty dollars in doctor's bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the strength and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month, on the first trial. He continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive of sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for two years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $5 per bottle (express charges). Sent free by express on receipt of price.

J. J. C. COOK, publisher of the State Banner, Benningtown, Vt., says: he was attacked with DYSPEPSIA, and suffered so severely from it that not a particle of food could be swallowed without occasioning the most uncomfortable sensation in his stomach. For five years he suffered from this dreadful complaint, when he used BRANDRETH'S PILLS. The first box did not seem to benefit him much, but the second produced a change, and by the time he had taken six boxes a COMPLETE CURE was effected. He says: "My dyspepsia was gone, and my expectation of my early death vanished."

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE "ALBEMARLE."

We illustrate on this page one of the most exciting incidents of naval warfare, and give a portrait of the chief actor concerned, Lieutenant WILLIAM B. CUSHING.

The rebel ram Albemarle was one of the most formidable vessels which the Confederate navy ever floated. It played a conspicuous part in the capture of Plymouth last spring, and on that occasion sank the Southfield. She attacked the Miami also; and a shot from the latter, striking the iron walls of the ram, rebounded and killed Captain ELLISON of the Miami, who was an intimate friend of CUSHING. It is said that for this reason Lieutenant CUSHING vowed vengeance against the Albemarle. This ram was the same which was engaged in the memorable conflict with the Sassacus, and two other heavily-armed double-enders on the 5th of May last—an event which was illustrated in the Weekly for June 4. The utmost, however, which these three vessels by their combined efforts were able to accomplish amounted to but a slight injury to the rebel iron-clad, though sufficient to compel its retirement. It has ever since been a source of considerable apprehension, and has made it necessary for Admiral LEE to greatly increase his naval force in the Sound. As early as last June Lieutenant CUSHING, then commanding the Monticello, submitted to the Admiral a plan for the destruction of the Albemarle. The plan was approved, and the Lieutenant withdrawn from the Monticello to perform this special service. Since that date Admiral LEE has been succeeded by Admiral PORTER, who has signalized his assumption of command by the destruction of the Albemarle.

After the conception of his plan Lieutenant CUSHING came to New York, and, in conjunction with Admiral GREGORY, Captain BOGGS, and Chief Engineer W. W. WOOD, applied to one of the new steam-pickets a torpedo arrangement and returned to the Sound. The torpedo arrangement was invented by Mr. WOOD, and was illustrated in the Weekly of October 1. The Albemarle had been lying at Plymouth for some weeks previous to its destruction. A mile below the town on the west of the Southfield a rebel picket was stationed. On the night of October 27 CUSHING, with a company of thirteen men, proceeded up the Roanoke River toward Plymouth. The distance from the mouth of the river to the ram was eight miles. The picket above-mentioned was passed without alarm, and the Albemarle was discovered lying fast to the wharf "with logs around her about thirty feet from her side." As the party approached the rebels opened fire from the shore, which was returned by the steam-launch. The approach was made in the form of a circle and with bows on, and when the logs were struck they were driven in some feet, the bows of the launch resting on them. "The torpedo-boom was then lowered," says Lieutenant CUSHING, "and by a vigorous pull I succeeded in diving the torpedo under the overhang, and exploding it at the same time that the Albemarle's gun was fired. A shot seemed to go crashing through my boat, and a dense mass of water rushed in from the torpedo, filling the launch and completely disabling her. The enemy then continued his fire at fifteen feet range and demanded our surrender, which I twice refused, ordering the men to save themselves and removing my overcoat and shoes. Springing into the river I swam, with others, into the middle of the stream, the rebels failing to hit us."

CUSHING's escape was so precipitate that he was not able to report the destruction of the ram from his own observation, but formed his judgment from a conversation which he heard while concealed in the marshes close to the enemy's fort, and from the report of a negro whom he sent into the town for information. He had become exhausted in swimming, and had taken shelter in the immediate vicinity of the enemy. He was picked up by the Valley City on the night of the 30th, having made his way to that vessel in a skiff captured from an enemy's picket.

Lieutenant CUSHING is a citizen of New York.

From the Richmond papers we learn that the Albemarle was destroyed, and that none of CUSHING's party were killed, only one of them, indeed, having been wounded. No lives were lost on board the Albemarle. The destruction of this vessel has given us possession of Plymouth.

GUNS CAPTURED BY SHERIDAN.

We engraved last week an illustration representing the arrival at the War Department of the battle-flags captured from the rebels by General SHERIDAN. A few days after this event, on October 19, General TORBERT arrived in Washington with the pieces of artillery, nearly thirty in number, which were taken from the rebels in the battle of Cedar Creek. We give on page 744 an illustration of the reception of these guns at the War Department. These did not, of course, include those of our guns which had been captured by the enemy and were afterward retaken. The capture of guns from the rebel army of Virginia can only be accomplished after a severe struggle. The rebels hold on to their guns till the last, and only yield them because they must. This fact, taken in consideration with the large number of guns which SHERIDAN has captured in his recent campaign, indicates the severity of the fighting which has been done this fall in the Shenandoah Valley. Our superiority in cavalry has doubtless diminished the difficulty which has always attended the capture of artillery on our part.

BATTERY GOING INTO POSITION.

We engrave on page 745 an illustration which one of our artists in the West sends us, representing in a spirited manner the appearance of a battery of flying artillery going into position. The artillery of an army is one of its most powerful auxiliaries. It multiplies many times the effect of a single musket, and is equal to the addition to an army of several thousand men. As the cavalry represents the velocity and dash of onset, so the artillery represents the weight and volume of attack. It is of especial value in checking an advance of the enemy either in front or on the flank; and it is for this reason that an assailing column aims first at the adversary's guns, because these having been captured the lines of infantry are easily broken up and routed.

THE ELECTION.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN and ANDREW JOHNSON have been elected by enormous and universal majorities in almost all the States, President and Vice-President of the United States for the next four years. This result is the proclamation of the American people that they are not conquered; that the rebellion is not successful; and that, deeply as they deplore war and its inevitable suffering and loss, yet they have no choice between war and national ruin, and must therefore fight on. In an unfortunate moment for himself General MCCLELLAN permitted his name to be used as the symbol of the cowardice and subjugation of his fellow-citizens, and from that moment his defeat was a foregone conclusion.

The moral effect of the election both at home and abroad will be of the most impressive character. It shows our foreign enemies that they have nothing to hope from the divisions of this country, while the rebels will see in it the withering and invincible purpose of their loyal fellow-citizens, who ask of them nothing but obedience to the Constitution of the United States, and the laws and acts made in pursuance of it. Whenever they shall choose to overthrow the military despotism that holds them fast—whenever they shall see that no great section of this country can, under equal and respected laws, have any permanent and profound interest different from all the rest—then they will find that the loyal men of the country are longing to throw two fatal arms and cement a Union that shall be eternal.

But the lesson of the election is, that every constitutional right and law must be absolutely respected. There must be no threats, no revolts, and no hope of extorting terms by arms. The Constitution is the sole condition of the Government; and if citizens ponder it as they are constitutional, that difference must be peacefully and constitutionally settled. This is what the people have declared by four years of war, and this is what they confirm by the re-election of Mr. LINCOLN. In himself, notwithstanding his unwearied patience, perfect fidelity, and remarkable ability, he is unimportant except as the representative of the feeling and purpose of the American people he is the most important fact in the country.

One other of the most significant lessons of the election is, that the people are conscious of the power and value of their own organization. They expect the utmost vigor in the prosecution of the war by every legitimate method, and they naturally require that the authority of the Government, which is to be established as the continuance of the war, shall not be endangered by its end. When the authority of any Government is openly and forcibly defied it must be maintained unconditionally by arms. When that authority is established and unquestioned, every true Government will be friendly, patient, conciliatory, but firm and just.

Yet the grandest lesson of the result is its vindication of the American system of free popular government. No system in history has ever exposed so much a strain directly along the fibre as that which ours has endured in the war and the political campaign, and no other could possibly have endured it successfully. The result is due to the general intelligence of the people, and to the security of perfectly free discussion. And that is maintained and, gladly upheld by all parties in the land, at every country crossroad, and in every city and State, and the Union and the Government are forever secure. They have been maintained by the authority of the Government itself, and we see the result. Thank God and the people, we are a nation which confounds its enemies and inspires once to human progress and civilization, and which recognizes that law is the indispensable condition of Liberty.

BRYANT'S BIRTHDAY.

THE Century Club in New York grew out of the Sket ch Club some twenty years ago. The Sketch Club was a private social assembly of men interested in literature and art which occasionally combined sandwiches with esthetics, and oysters with criticism. Composed of men of every pursuit, it was a cultivated, genial, sympathetic society, of which we speak in the past tense, yet which we believe still survives. But it had a room and no local habitation. It was a shifting feast from house to house of its members. The "Century" was founded as a proper club. It was the natural fruit of the ringed seed of the Sketch Club; it struck root and flourishes perennial.

The Saturday evenings at the Century are memorable to many whose feet seldom cross its threshold now. They ring still in the past with wit and song and laughter. The authors and artists of New York and men of cultivated and generous sympathies have been always counted among its members, and the wandering authors and artists of other countries have been gladly hailed as its guests. Among its founders was WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT, and upon the recent return of his birthday, when he completed his seventieth year, his fellow-members of the Century made a festival to express their respect for the man and their honor for the poet.

The Century was already famous for its festivals. For many years it had annually celebrated Twelfth Night, and there have been many beautiful and happy holiday dinners given to public mention is made. The artists who are members always secure a picturesque grace and delight in the decorations of the table drawing room of the Club-house is a fit scene for the sparkling and illustrious company which the feasts assemble. Here, on the evening of the 5th of November, the members of the Century and an illustrious company of invited guests assembled. The great room was decorated with flowers, wreaths, the national colors, pictures and statues Upon a slightly-raised platform stood MR. BRYANT and MR. BANCROFT, the historian, President of the Club, surrounded by groups of friends, among whom were EMERSON, WILLIS, HOLMES, STREET, TUCKERMAN, TAYLOR, BOKER, STODDARD, READ, and others. The President made a speech of congratulation and hope, to which MR BRYANT fitly and modestly responded A chant for the poet's birthday by BAYARD TAYLOR, the music by the artist LEONARD LANG, was then sung by the choir boys of Trinity Church. Letters were read from the absent poets LONGFELLOW, HALLECK, WHITTIER, and CHILDS, followed by a poem by EMERSON, PERSON, and the recitation of poems by MESSRS. HOWE, BOKER, and HOLMES. More letters were read, more poems from STODDARD and STREET, more speeches; and an album of original sketches by the most eminent American artists was presented to MR. BRYANT with a proper speech from various members of the Club. MR. HUNTINGTON, President of the National Academy, spoke for the artists, and the guest of the evening replied. Then there was dancing, and at midnight the feast ended amidst the most friendly hilarity.

There is something very impressive in this purely literary festival upon the eve of the most important election that has occurred in the country. But it is impossible not to remember that the poet BRYANT is the author of the lines JOHN MILTON'S, his is no fugitive virtue cloistered and unbreathed, and his name will shine in our history like the star of WASHINGTON, like English, with the twin lustre of patriotism and poetry. STODDARD'S lines are a true as melodious when he says, speaking of the country which BRYANT has saved so well, and has so well served:

> "And now, even in her purest need,
> Pale, bleeding, faint to every limb,
> She still remembers to be fair,
> And comes to honor him.
> "For here, not sure, the songs we bring,
> The flowers, the praises, the delight
> And tie her hand that lays the wreath
> On his gray head to-night."

THE WARNING OF HISTORY

UNDER the title "State Rights, a photograph from Ancient Greece" (MURSON, Albany), Professor TAYLER LEWIS, one of the most distinguished Greek scholars in the country, shows that country a signal service. The intention of his pamphlet is to show, from the history of Greece, the utter folly and the fatal results from the system which we call State sovereignty The execution of the work is masterly. The style is sinewy, sparkling, and trenchant, and the comprehensive statesmanship and masterly illustration and impregnable in reasoning, has an impassioned glow and tension which recall the nobler words of the ancient orators by which the argument is drawn. There is no work upon this momentous topic in all our political literature which is more complete or more richly rewards thoughtful study than this little treatise of Professor LEWIS

It was issued before the election, but its importance is not affected by any such event. For it discusses the fundamental principle of the rebellion, the principle which must be thoroughly exposed and rejected before we can have a national peace. The war is the conflict between National and State sovereignty. The rebellion was only possible upon that ground. Foreseeing that the development of our civilization would sooner or later show the exact relation between injustice and individual interest, and that Slavery would be revealed as the fatal source of all labor, the Southern leaders prepared for the crisis, not by instigating a rebellion in the name of Slavery, but by deluding the people around with the chimera of State sovereignty. They knew that they could stimulate their followers by that appeal when every thing else was impracticable. After a generation of war in great part of the country, a compact between sovereign powers, and that each power was the sole judge when the terms of the compact had been infringed, and also of the remedy. From this theory sprang the assertion that sovereign States could not lawfully be coerced, and the demand of JEFFERSON DAVIS to be "let alone."

This is the future question of the country. If secession be a reserved Constitutional right, as the rebels claim, then the Union exists only at the will of a State for any purpose satisfactory to itself. In the present instance the plea is the protection of "rights," meaning Slavery. In another it will be "rights," meaning a tariff; or some form of taxation, or whatever the leaders may choose. But whatever the pretext the principle appealed to is the principle of national disintegration and ruin. With pathetic power Professor LEWIS summons wrecked and wretched Greece from her tomb of a thousand years to show to the new world the wounds by which she fell, and by which alone any woeful experience can, against the deep damnation of the taking off of this nation.

THE GOVERNMENT.

EVERY man in the country should resist the effort which is often made to represent "the Government" as an independent and dangerous power "The Government" does this, "the Government" does that, we are told by fiery orators, as if the Government were an oppressive and despotic tyrant.

That is a kind of talk which is intelligible elsewhere, but which has no significance here. Our Government is not something above and beyond the people: it is simply the constitutional expression of the popular will. Consequently, to resist the Government is to resist the people; for the same instrument which establishes the constitutional form of the Government also provides for correcting its errors and withstanding any conceivable invasion of popular liberty. If, for instance, a man is of opinion that any act of the Government is exceeding his authority, he may complain, and the law gives him the remedy. But to suppose that all the rest of the Government, including, of course, the House of Representatives, are in conspiracy against popular rights is ridiculous, because the people themselves elect the Representatives every two years.

In any system, indeed, where questions are decided by ballot there may be such fraud or force that the ballot does not fairly indicate the real wish of the people. But while such disturbing elements are found at particular points, they can not exist universally without betraying a condition of affairs which proves the popular system to be impracticable. Nobody supposes, probably, that all the votes polled at a general election in the city of New York are fair and lawful votes. The result in that city can not be held to indicate, according to the actual proportion, the wish of the voters upon any question or candidate. When, therefore, there were the same suspicion, the same uncertainty overhanging every poll in the country, there would be a distressing doubt as to the real popular will, unless the figures were palpably beyond the suspicion of fraud. But that very state of things would create such indifference, timidity, or acquiescence in fraud as virtually to make the vote express the force, if not the actual numbers, of public opinion.

Votes are valuable when there are men behind them, as EMERSON says of words. The question of this rebellion is simply whether there are men behind the votes. If there are, then the Government of the United States is merely the American people willing, speaking, and acting. If there are not, then the Government is a mask, which the most daring hand will snatch and wear.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE LIEUTENANT-GENERAL.

WHEN the letters between the President and General GRANT at the opening of the summer campaign were published, we did not especially allude to them. But we now reprint them that every man in the land may understand what cordial sympathy there is between the two men. It is not easy to parallel, it is impossible to surpass, in history the simple manliness of the correspondence. Two honest, faithful, sagacious men, who have one cause only at heart, that of the country—who are each peculiarly representative of a certain dominable patience and tenacity which is characteristically American, are providentially in this emergency at the head of our civil and military administration. If the Government had always been in such hands we should have had no war to deplore. Let every citizen at home and soldier and sailor in the service carefully read and ponder these letters:

> "EXECUTIVE MANSION,
> WASHINGTON April 30, 1864.
> "Lieutenant-General Grant
> "Not expecting to see you before the spring campaign opens I wish to express in this any my entire satisfaction with what you have done up to the time so far as I understand it. The particulars of your plans I neither know, nor seek to know. You are vigilant and self-reliant, and pleased with this, I wish not to obtrude any restraints or constraints upon you. While I can very anxious that any thing attempted shall succeed well, I do not expect success shall be avoided, I know that these points are less likely to escape your attention than they would be mine. If there be any thing wanting, which is within my power to give, do not fail to let me know it.
> "And now, with a brave army and a just cause, may God sustain you. Yours, very truly,
> "A. LINCOLN."

GRANT'S REPLY.

> "HEADQUARTERS ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES,
> CULPEPER COURT-HOUSE, May 1, 1864.
> "MR PRESIDENT,—Your very kind letter of yesterday is just received. I cannot express you express the confidence and satisfaction for the part in my military administration is acknowledged by you public. It shall be my constant endeavor that you and the country shall not be disappointed. From my first entrance into the volunteer service in the country to the present day I have never had reason to complain, have never expressed or implied a complaint against the Administration or the Secretary of War for thwarting any embarrassment in the way of my vigorously prosecuting what appeared to be my duty.

Indeed since the campaign which placed me in command of all the armies, and in view of the great responsibilities and importance of success, I have been astonished at the readiness with which every thing asked for has been granted, without even an explanation being asked. Should any thing be refused hereafter I desire and expect, the last I can say is, the fault is not with you.

"Very truly, your obedient servant,

"U. S. GRANT, Lieutenant-General."

THE WAY OF ACCIDENTS.

As the winter approaches, and a winter which the weather-wise assure us is to be peculiarly severe, it is alarming to remark how frequent are railway accidents. The last instance was the New Haven Road, followed immediately by that upon the New London, and again upon the Hudson, and by several Western accidents, with that of a week since upon the Erie, aroused the public mind for a moment; but the interest of the citizen evaporated with all other public care. Now that it is past, we hope that the dangers of the railways may be remembered to some good result.

There is no doubt that many of our railroads are allowed to fall into a perilous state before proper measures are taken to avoid fatal consequences. Rotten sleepers and the rails often notoriously worn out before they are replaced; and passengers are daily whirled along tracks on which they pass with fear and trembling. The New Haven Road, one of the best roads, is for several miles the only direct land avenue out of New York into New England. The travel is prominent. The press of trains is constant. The security of the road should, therefore, be almost perfect. Yet it was the matter of common conversation before the summer that the road was in bad order, and nobody who traveled much upon it was surprised when the late accident occurred.

We do not say that the particular accident was avoidable. Some defect in the iron, which it was not possible to know until it was exposed to the strain, the condition of the road, a blister inevitable, may explain this accident, as similar reasons will explain others But that very fact should impress upon the managers of railroads the necessity of the most careful personal observation. What is the effect upon iron of the movement of heavy trains? In what way may the natural elasticity of wood be affected? Improved effects be best obviated? All such questions should be constantly entertained and answered by study and experiment.

It is true that, in view of the constant and enormous railroad travel in this country, great disasters are comparatively infrequent. At every hour of the day and night there are thousands of human beings thundering along upon the rails, yet, upon the whole, how few are hurt! It is estimated that the Illinois Central Railroad has transported thirty millions of people, the entire population of the United States, and without the loss of a single life, except through the acknowledged fault of the driver. Such a record is as honorable as it is remarkable. Yet with proper care it might be the rule of every road. It is one of the immutable laws that, as the sailor expressed it, God has somehow so fixed the world that a man can afford to do right. Nor can there be any question that the safer a railroad is, the more profitable it is.

We warn the managers that peculiar care is necessary, now that the frosts are coming; and that they will not accept any easy apology for an appalling tragedy.

PARTIES.

BECAUSE Patriotism requires in times of public peril the earnest support of certain candidates, it does not therefore become Partyism. Neither Partyism is not necessarily between policies proposed; on the contrary, it is the faithful support of that policy which promises greater security to the Government. Parties are inevitable and desirable in every constitutional system. But when we speak of such parties we mean, of course, men and policies which ally themselves to the better interests of the nation. There is such a thing as faction as well as party. There is such a thing as a traitor as well as a patriot. Therefore when BENEDICT ARNOLD was not a true American whose political views differed from those of WASHINGTON; he was a traitor Thus also PEMBERTON was not an honest political opponent, he is a rebel.

Hostility to causeless and bloody rebellion is a partizan duty, which, we trust, we shall never forget. Whatever favors rebellion or excuses rebels will always be resisted by truly patriotic citizens. Rebellion can not, by any legitimate sense, be a party policy. It has not been so in this country, although the rebels hoped it might be made so. The true men of all the old parties stood together for the Government, and they stand there now. And, at such a time as this, the only legitimate party division is a party of loyalty, and those who shall be swiftly and severely and unconditionally vindicate the national honor, maintain the national authority, and defend the national domain? These are the only questions that ought now to be entertained by the American people.

And upon these questions there can not properly be any mere party division. The election of November 8 has destroyed all existing parties. Mr. LINCOLN is not elected because he was a Republican, nor General MCCLELLAN defeated because he was a Democrat. The election is the expression of the overpowering determination of the people that there shall be no parties during a war for the life of the nation. We have but one duty before us, and that is to defend the nation against foreign and domestic foes. A vigorous and unyielding war is now heartily accepted by the people as the only way to peace.

THE ARTISTS' FUND SOCIETY.

THIS Society, now in its fifth year, is designed for the relief of suffering artists. It is in fact a Mutual Insurance Company, the source of its receipts being an annual sale of pictures contributed by the members. Among the piles of political and purely commercial pamphlets it is a pleasure to come upon the simple, modest statement of the operations of this Society for its fourth year. It has a fund of thirteen thousand dollars in the treasury, yielding an income of about one thousand dollars. The required value of contributions is fifty dollars each. They are collected in a gallery, and after proper exhibition are sold. The results of the last sale showed an average of seventy-six dollars for each contributor, against seventy-three in the previous year. As CAMILLUS was the native Freisdent—we intend no pun, although the pun would be equally true—and the management is entirely in the hands of the artists, Friendly general brotherhood! the heart is drawn to their peaceful labors all the more warmly in the stormy times upon which we are cast. And, like their work, the authors, never do they appear in a lovelier light than that of charity to each other—and to their critics.

A NEW VOLUME OF "HARPER."

WITH the December Number of Harper's Magazine begins the Twenty-ninth Volume, full-freighted with unabated energy and interest. The hold which this monthly has upon the popular heart is unexhausting as it ought to be: for there is no magazine published which is more skillfully adapted to the popular sympathy and taste. The facilities of the Publishers enable them to secure the early publication of the best stories of the best English authors, as well as the contributions of the most attractive American writers. Dickens's "Our Mutual Friend"—one of his most characteristic works—began in this Magazine, and is completed in not every month. Ross Browne's "Tour through Arizona," illustrated by his own drawings, give the freshest and most amusing passages of American travel and adventure; while the popular historian of NAPOLEON, JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, begins, in the December Number, "Historic Boys: Lives of Role Men," being the most interesting and brilliant passages in the history of the war for the Union.

The Number will also begin the new novel of WILKIE COLLINS, author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc. It is called "Armadale," and is a story of commanding interest and a mature power. The first number thoroughly arouses the reader's interest and expectation, and is superior in its characteristic way to any opening chapters of his previous works. There, with the usual wonderful compass a monthly fiction will be heartily commend to all our readers. WILKIE COLLINS has fairly won his laurels. He is now showing that he can justly wear them.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE first young men, just returning home after a slight cursual, ew the en rising. One of them insisted it was the sun, the other said it was the moon. The former believe it to be first sun they met. He also had been out on a lark. The latter, shy, but not unwilling to be made a little bit whether that's the sun or the moon that's now rising, and he was forced to have you decide the matter." "Just it, gentlemen, I should be very happy; but you see I have to be in the city, and I am afraid I shall be late."

THE HORNED KIND OF ARCHITECTURE.—Building cattle in the air.

THE LIGHT OF OTHER DAYS.—Oil lamps.

Why is a vain young lady like a confirmed drunkard?—Because neither of them are satisfied with the moderate use of the bottle.

This is worth noting: wife controll'd by dollars;
Dollars by wife controll'd.
The one may spend can scarce be said in fullness;
The other, in the word.
Taken to live of common men would be.

"Who is he?" said a passer-by to a policeman, who was endeavoring to raise an intoxicated individual that had fallen into a gutter. Given you a bone, a bone, a pie,
Given you meal a pat on the head!
Now you've ridden, this world to die,
Where is the bark and the wag of your tale?

The following is ingenious as a specimen of two months' leap in the nine words, after the manner of the old versebuilders—each word in which has a letter more than the one before it and supplied. The one nerse is found in reading the first word, and the other by reading the last word in the last one:

A celebrated divine in the west of Scotland, while one day taking his usual walk, happened to come on a little boy busily engaged in forming a miniature building of clay. Curious to see what progress he was making, he at once began his interrogatories as follows: "Well, my little man, what are you doing?" "Building a house, Sir." "What kind of a house?" "A brick, Sir." "Where's the door?" "I'm no at the door yet, Sir," answered he, with his finger. "Where's the pulpit?" "There," said the boy, pointing to the middle of the floor. The divine observed boy, again asked, "Ay, but where's the minister?" "I'm coming to that, Sir," answered the boy, in a huff, and with a scratch of his head, replied, "Oh, I ha'na enough o' clay to make the minister."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

ON TUESDAY, the 8th of November, the people of the twenty-five loyal States voted for the President and Vice-President of the United States. The returns from all but two of these States, namely, New York, Massachusetts, Michigan, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, and Nevada, have been complete hold elections of State officers. The election was proceeded with fairly, without even the ordinary commotion. Every possible and expedient measure was adopted to secure the ballot-box from fraud and State Governments. There had been rumors of a mobilized invasion of States on the Northern border, and of violent schemes involving the release of rebel prisoners and the destruction of the principal Northern cities. The indications that such violence was contemplated were considered sufficient to justify the Government in sending troops North in such numbers, and so disposed, as to render these attempts, if not futile, easily to be met and suppressed. It was not taken that these armed men should not even appear, unobtrusively necessary. The Massachusetts troops sent to New York City to take command of the troops which were carrying force to meet the rioting emergencies.

As we go to press the returns of the election are incomplete; but it is certain that ABRAHAM LINCOLN has been re-elected President and ANDREW JOHNSON elected Vice-President of the United States by overwhelming majorities.

THE CAMPAIGN IN VIRGINIA.

Since the movement of October 27 nothing important has occurred in the armies of the James and of the Potomac. On the night of the 29th (Sunday) the rebels effected an unusual move by the picket line at the point of connection of the Second and Fifth Corps, and passing from one part to another of the line of the Fifth Corps. The number captured was nearly 400. It was intended to follow up this advantage gained by surprise by an assault at the same point, but this was frustrated by the escape of one of the pickets, who gave prompt information of the enemy's movement. Some time previous to this event the rebels had begun felling a considerable forest on the enemy. The point where the Second and Fifth Corps connect appears to be a salient, and there is also a salient on the Army of the Potomac are specially directed.

Considerable activity has been manifested on the part of the rebels in the Valley since the battle of Cedar Creek. On the 5th they were reported to be in force at Bunker Hill, between Martinsburg and Winchester. On the 2d General Averell had an affair with a rebel force at Kearneysville, in which the enemy were driven with a loss of 100 men. It is also reported that the rebels have been concentrating in the vicinity of Staunton, and that Early has been ordered to report to Richmond with his command.

On the 30th and 31st of October an important correspondence occurred between Lieutenant-General Grant and General Lee in regard to the treatment of prisoners. General Lee opened the correspondence. He stated that the prisoners in the Confederate hospitals were treated by them as prisoners of war unless they were identified as deserters of African descent, and that deserters of African descent from slave to labor was created. Those who were identified as slaves were delivered to their masters. He referred to the policy of the American States in the case of the Revolutionary war, and to the fact that the British returned to their owners all slaves captured in war who had been abducted from the country occupied by British armies. He said that the negroes who had been employed on the rebel lines of fortification, and who had fallen into the hands of the enemy through an error of his engineer officer, and were meant to be sent into the rear, and that General Grant knew that all Federal soldiers when captured by the Confederates must be treated as prisoners of war. This letter was treated otherwise he must resort to the policy of retaliation.

THE CAMPAIGN IN GEORGIA.

A dispatch from General Blunt, dated Neosho, Missouri, October 30, says that on that day he came up with Price at Newtonia, and after a severe fight of three hours, drove the enemy from the field in confusion, with the loss of over 500, including 200 prisoners. The fight lasted about 12h. The Federal troops consisted of only two brigades, and were fought by Price in person. The enemy was fully 10,000 strong. Price is retreating toward Carthage, and will be pursued. Gen. Blunt says that Price will be defeated in Missouri completely, and shortly by the prompt operations of Rosecrans and Pleasonton. Prompt movements. The rebel General Shelby, with a force of 5,000 men, was reported to be at Lamar, Mo. He had been generally driven from the State, and was now making his last raid. He had been pushed, and at Fox Ridge suffered a terrible defeat. Gen. Rosecrans gave as a reason for Shelby's escape that Gen. Pleasonton's horses were worn out.

"This was followed by an attack which was prolonged for three hours, and which the complete repulse of the enemy, who left his dead on the ground, amounting to more than 100 in number. Our loss was 5 killed and 20 wounded. The 'effusion of blood' was not 'useless' as the repulse of Shelby's command is very important to the present and future operations.

"The enemy is pressing our flag, and are hereby accorded, to General Corse, Colonel Tourtelotte, officers and men, for the handsome manner in which the defense of Allatoona, and it is made an example to illustrate the importance of preparing in time, for the defense of any point, by earthen, boldly, manfully, and well.

"Our position, unassailable in the garrison, was encouraging by moving toward the road by which the enemy would make approach, and effectually were defeated by the rain and mud; but this fact fastened the retreat of the enemy.

"Commanders and garrisons of the posts along our railroads will be encouraged by the defense of Allatoona, and till the last minute, sure that the time gained is valuable and necessary to their comrades in the front.

"By order of Major-General SHERMAN."

CAPTURE OF THE "FLORIDA."

We are sorry to have to record another naval triumph which blots from the sea the most powerful privateer of the Confederate States. The rebel steam-sloop-of-war Florida was captured by the United States steamer Rhode Island, in the harbor of Bahia, Brazil. Fifty-nine of the crew and twelve officers of the pirate were taken with her. The Florida was towed out to sea, and was soon after arrived on the Kearsarge at Boston November 7. The following is the official report:

The Florida arrived at Bahia, Bay of San Salvador, on the night of October 4, and anchored near the Brazilian port, and Captain Collins, commanding the vessel, after consultation with his officers, determined to take the Florida. The privateer was attacked at three o'clock in the morning, and surprised, and after a short struggle was compelled to surrender. Captain Morris, commanding the Wyoming, at Japan, on the China coast, was shown all the lines, and was not replaced. The capture of this vessel will be a great satisfaction to the whole country. The Tallahassee is again at work, and that two new privateers are afloat, namely, the Olustee and the Chickamauga.

The Chickamauga is commanded by Lieutenant John Low, and is a screw steamer of 1,000 tons, and was designed at the beginning of the war. The vessel is a very fast one, and carries a armament of three guns, one 32-pounder and two 8-in. She is manned by 101 men, and ran out of Wilmington on the night of October 18.

The Olustee is an iron screw steamer, 1,100 tons burden, 200 feet long, and very fast. She ran out of Wilmington on the night of the 30th, and is commanded by Lieutenant William H. Ward, of Virginia, who was also an old officer of the United States Navy.

A REBEL PLOT.

The rebels have been scheming to liberate the prisoners confined at Camp Douglas, Chicago, on the day of election. The plot, however, was discovered in time to prevent any serious outbreak. Preparations were made, however, to carry out arms and ammunition were found in the possession of the prisoners. One of the chief rebels is Colonel Marmaduke, brother of the rebel Governor.

SOUTHERN CONSCRIPTION OF SLAVES.

The Richmond Examiner says that the extension of the Conscript law to slaves is daily growing in favor, and will be adopted by the next Confederate Congress. The Montgomery Appeal regards the proposition as unwise if not dangerous, and objects to it as a fatal blow to the institution of slavery, and as an indication that all other resources have been exhausted. The Mobile Tribune says that every thing must be sacrificed to the independence of the Confederacy. As to the effects of the proposition on the institution of slavery, the Richmond Examiner says, the proposition of empties is not present difficulty, but their employment and discipline. Slaves must not be set out in the transportation of supplies, but when in the army they will be better fed and better clad than privates are as well as to fight."

The Enquirer, do not agree with the Examiner; at least one of its correspondents, who signs himself A. B., does not. The Richmond Whig says that the proposition generally, would, we believe, desert to the Yankees; and calls attention to the fact that in many such other countries many never desert to the rebels. The Examiner answers that it has no fears for desertion to the Confederates, but we do not have this apprehension if he should see negroes in theirs army, and understand that we are being more rewarded with freedom and a home in the South. "But," says A. B., "the negroes won't fight." The Examiner replies: "We confess that at one time we entertained the same opinion, but the gallant conduct of negroes relative to us privately upon this subject (on which we could give the name), and the good behavior of the negroes overcame this objection. He says: 'Fort Gilmer, the other day, showed what negroes will do when put with other troops in the parapet, to be shot or they appeared above.' But fighting is not the only duty demanded of the negro. In the Union war 'over one hundred thousand men' were employed in the army and navy. The Richmond Enquirer of the British army, employed on roads, was over ten thousand. The negroes were wanted, not only to fight, but as laborers and working men, to relieve the soldiers."

The Richmond Whig says further: "We are not prepared to say that this measure is demanded by our present exhaustion. We do not believe it is. But the future must be provided for; and it must be apparent to every sensible man that the strain upon the fighting of the Confederate States which this war has made must eventually exhaust the people, and that something is done to relieve this drain from other sources than the white population. The Confederate armies must be kept up, and the war must be waged, its execution, however much improved, can not find the means of success. We fail to see how any policy avoids them. Shall we permit the enemy to use the negroes against us, or shall we ourselves use them ourselves?"

FOREIGN NEWS.

EUROPE.

IT appears now to be a settled policy of the English Government that the Queen's Speech should contain the pledges of a separate government wherever they may choose, and to keep such pledges themselves from their first Sessional obligations. For this reason the project of a Canadian Confederation, which was proposed by the Governor of Canada, and which the United States the latter would be glad to see carried through an attack in England, which would compel England to transport a large military and naval force across the Atlantic. The Queen's Speech on this situation for England to escape either defeat. The intelligence from Canada are now of the most hostile to the Country. There is much angry dissatisfaction among the people at the inferior position of the colonies in the western part of Australia. This had become a just cause of war, and the Governor of Canada, Sir JOHN YOUNG, protest having been disregarded, the Australians have quite recently taken up arms. Their views upon the subject of secession to their demands or their independence. It is probable that they will be successful.

Lord Stanley has been making a speech in England which has created much excitement. He has declared himself made against it is that it has too much coolness and common sense to be popular. He first expresses his surprise at the request to the American war. He, like General Sherman, believes that the war will soon be over. He thinks that the Federals will finally succeed for all purposes of practical value, but that they can not do so immediately, namely, the maintenance of this conquest. He thinks that the war will be a great drain on our resources in men or money, and he hints that the Confederates may be so that of conquest. Passing from the American to the Italian question, Stanley thinks that the solution of the latter is not going to be by the arrangement made by France. In regard to General Stanley's speech that the Confederacy people will soon disappear, the Confederation having broken down, he says that the reverse is the case. The Republic is only a question of time. He disapproves of forcing the Confederacy into submission. In this respect he says: "It is not now the usurper, it is the middle class—the great mass of people—who are the sufferers in the country, and by far the most powerful class in it—that exercises the Government. We do not think that we are not likely to part with it—that is, of their own free will—for the sake of the Union. It is not now in the history of this country; and I see no such movement on the part of the people of the Confederate States as to make me hear the resistance which might be expected."

The Paris Constitutionnel says the Emperor was lately refused a supply of coals at the British ports, because that article was contraband of war. It is now declared free, while all very well if the neutrality laws are so rigidly applied to the Federals.

Mr. Benjamin, the rebel Secretary of Treasury, has been having a commission to the French capital to borrow 500,000,000 francs. The object of discouraging Europeans from any investment in United States bonds. The rebel agent has been successful under the most extreme usuries. Among the terms are that the money is to be paid in gold, and who lately exerted himself so strenuously for the French Emperor in Mexico. The interest is to be 7 per cent, and £3,750 was realized from the sales, and nearly as much on the Confederate Treasury. Secretary Mason of Mire still has announced her intention of getting up a similar bazar in London.

The commercial failures in England continue to excite much comment.

MEXICO.

There is no longer any formidable armed opposition to the imperial government in Mexico. The war continues, but it is said to be only a series of petty operations, which are unimportant, and nearly all of his late forces have either been captured or have become impracticable. Several have disappeared. Cortinas, on the 26th of October, crossed the Rio Grande to General Weitzel, who then surrendered Matamoras and Tamaulipas to the French.

"MONSIEUR LE MARÉCHAL DE FRANCE, DUC DE BASSANO, Sir,—I send the bearer to you, and the Mexican troops which, until to-day, I have had the honor to command, to submit ourselves to the will of the Emperor, Napoleon III., and to the valor of your Excellency's esteemed commander-in-chief, which I have just received.

"We rely on the personal and official protection of your Excellency in the magnanimity of the new government. Excellency in the magnanimity of the new government. Excellency in the magnanimity of the new government.

THE VIRGINIA CAMPAIGN.

On this and the preceding page, and on page 748, we engrave illustrations of recent events in the Virginia Campaign.

An incident of unusual interest, though not important in its military bearings, was the capture of one of the rebel forts in front of Petersburg on the night of October 27, of which we give an illustration on this page, together with a portrait of Captain J. Z. BROWN, who took a prominent part in the assault. The Second and Third Divisions of the Second Corps, under EGAN and MOTT, were engaged in the movement against the Southside Railroad, and only RILEY'S Division was left to guard the intrenchments of the Second Corps. In the course of the day the enemy in front had also been greatly weakened to resist our column moving on his right flank. In the evening MILES ordered a reconnoissance to discover the force in his immediate front. For this purpose one hundred volunteers were solicited from the One Hundred and Forty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers. Besides Captain BROWN, four officers also volunteered: Lieutenants P. D. SPANGLER, ALEXANDER GEN. J. F. BENNER, and Captain H. D. PRICE. Forming in a trench leading from our picket line to the rebel fort in front, and armed with Spencer's seven shooters, they advanced over a space of two hundred and fifty yards against the fort, which was garrisoned by the Forty-sixth Virginia. This garrison was surprised, and our men advancing in front and on both flanks entered, and after a sharp skirmish took possession, capturing four commissioned officers, among whom was a nephew of Governor HENRY A. WISE. Captain PRICE was the first to enter the fort and was immediately afterward shot. We regret very much that it is impossible for us to give a portrait of Captain PRICE, a gallant officer, who entered the service originally as a private, and rose step by step from a Sergeant to First Lieutenant, and finally to a Captain's rank. He was a son of the Reverend Mr. PRICE, an Episcopal clergyman of Pottstown, Pennsylvania. The fort captured was in our possession half an hour when it was abandoned, on the arrival of fresh troops from other portions of the rebel line. It is impossible to say what advantages might have been gained by our troops if there had been a strong force on the ground ready to support and follow up this daring and successful assault.

The illustrations on page 748 relate to the operations of the Second and Fifth Corps, October 27. It will be remembered that in the advance against the enemy's right the Ninth Corps served as a pivot, the Fifth and Second taking more circuitous routes to the left. The Second Corps starting at half past 3 A.M., from a point in the vicinity of the Fifth Corps on the Weldon Road, advanced along the Vaughan Road, and crossing Hatcher's Run, struck for the Boydtoa plank road, up which they advanced with the intention of turning the enemy's extreme right. The sketch which we engrave of Armstrong's Mills shows the rebel works taken by the Second Corps in the morning. These works were on Hatcher's Run. It was at this point that the Fifth Corps came up, when the Second advanced, as already stated, toward the Boydton Road. The Fifth were to advance up the Run and connect with the right of the Second, but failing to do so on account of an imperfect knowledge of the country, a gap was left between the two columns, which, although it led to no serious reverse, yet gave the enemy so decided an advantage as to frustrate the main design of the movement. General CRAWFORD, although he failed to connect with the Second Corps, succeeded in capturing two or three hundred prisoners, including four officers, who were during the night conducted to the rear. This was difficult to accomplish, as the night was very dark, and the way led through dense woods and undergrowth, and the enemy, moreover, was in close proximity. Not a prisoner escaped, orders having been given to shoot the first man who stepped out of rank. The escape of a single man to the enemy would have resulted in their becoming acquainted with our movements. General CRAWFORD headed the column in person, picking his way along the bewildering roads by means of a compass.

CAPTAIN JERRY Z. BROWN.

We can not dismiss the operations on the left without alluding to the brilliant conduct of General EGAN'S division of the Second Corps. To understand the operations of this corps we must remember that it left the Vaughan Road before crossing Hatcher's Run, passing over to the Duncer Road, further west. Crossing on this road southward, it then advanced westward, and striking the Boydton Road again turned north up that road toward the Run. EGAN, who was in the advance, was about to cross, having already captured a line of works on the south bank, when MOTT'S Division, at his right, was attacked and pushed back. This left EGAN'S Division entirely exposed in that direction. His left was protected by GREGG'S cavalry. He altered his line, forming a square, and thus protecting flank and rear stood the brunt of three successive charges. These assaults were not only repulsed with severe loss to the enemy, but each repulse was followed by a counter-charge. EGAN succeeded in capturing nearly a thousand prisoners. MOTT'S Division was re-formed, and also captured several hundred prisoners.

Turning now to page 740, we have there three illustrations which relate to operations north of the James. One of these is a view of the Confederate iron-clads on the James River below Chaffin's Bluff, on the left of BUTLER'S army. Two miles below the Bluff, at the Dealyre House and at Signal Hill, two Federal batteries have lately been posted. On the 23d of October a sharp artillery duel took place between these and the rebel gun-boats, the latter consisting of the Virginia, Richmond, Fredericksburg, Hampton, and Drewry. The Drewry was struck by a shell, which blew up a gun-carriage and wounded five men. The Fredericksburg had her smoke-stack destroyed and six men wounded. The gun-boats finally retired out of range.

The remaining sketches on the page relate to the movement of BUTLER'S army on the 27th, and especially to the operations of the Tenth Corps on and beyond the Darbytown Road. The foreman was occupied in skirmishing. At noon the advance was ordered, and the enemy was driven inside of his intrenchments, from which he kept up a severe fire all along the line. Our men lay up close to the enemy's works and returned his fire, but without much effect, while suffering many casualties themselves. The First Connecticut Battery, Captain CLINTON, replied to a battery of the enemy's by shelling the woods and the rebel works in front. The action is represented in the sketch as it appeared from the Johnson House, from the windows of which General BUTLER and his staff witnessed the battle. This group of officers is given in another sketch on the same page.

AN APPEAL.

It would not cost you much, dear,
To linger in the shade,
While our gay companions wander
Up and down the woodland glade:
Let the red fern droop around us,
And the dend leaves flutter down,
Our hearts are fresh and green, dear,
Though the forest's scorch'd and brown.

It would not cost you much, dear,
To let me see your hand
Ungloved—though well I know it
For the fairest in the land:
And those dainty little fingers
For an instant might I hold;
It would not cost you much, dear;
To me, 'twere gain untold!

It would not cost you much, dear,
To hear me whisper low
A secret I discovered
Not quite a week ago.
Would you promise, having told you,
That I never need repent?
Ah! you guess it! No reply?
But your silence gives consent!

CAPTURE OF REBEL FORT IN FRONT OF PETERSBURG BY THE ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-EIGHTH PENNSYLVANIA, OCTOBER 27, 1864.—[SKETCHED BY A. W. WARREN.]

QUITE ALONE.

BY GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

CHAPTER LVI.

AT REST.

SEEING that the countess was seriously injured, Mr. M'Variety elevated himself upon the step of the ring, and inquired if there were a doctor present. There were several doctors present, all eager and anxious to distinguish themselves in the eyes of the public. There never is any lack of practitioners when accidents occur at places of public entertainment. M. D.'s in the stalls, M.B.'s in the boxes, M.R.C.S.'s in the pit; dentists in the slips, and herbalists in the gallery. It is like asking a question of a sewer sitter at a normal school; a score of arms go up at once. Get off your horse in a London thoroughfare, when you don't happen to be attended by a groom, and bridle-holders innumerable start up out of the earth. Medical advice was showered thickly upon Mr. M'Variety; pouring over from the boxes, the circle, and the amphitheatre into the arena like a cataract of healing waters. Mr. M'Variety would have been puzzled how to act had he not recognized among the volunteers a personal friend of his own. Dr. Bingham being singled out to attend the case, the others retired in high dudgeon, feeling themselves greatly aggrieved that they had not been allowed to deny themselves a night's rest, and be the instruments of alleviating suffering at the sacrifice of their comfort and of the ordinary reward, which none of them looked for, or would have accepted, if it had been offered to them.

Some hours more were spread upon one of the spring-boards used by the Bounding Brothers of Babylon, and the countess being lifted on this was paid out of the ring into the property-room behind the curtain. Sir William Long had gone to the countess's dressing-room to break the news to Lily, and to offer her what assistance and comfort he could under her new trial. He found her in great agitation, for she had heard the commotion in the circus, and divined that something had happened to her mother. When Sir William told her that the countess had fallen from the horse and was seriously hurt, the girl sank into a chair, and wept and sobbed bitterly. She felt no cause to weep for her dear mother; but in that one moment of her misfortune she forgot and forgave all, and thought of the hard-won success only with love and tenderness and pity.

"I trust, Lily," said Sir William, "I trust you will permit me to be your friend under this trial. I ask for nothing but to be allowed to serve you."

"Oh, Sir William, you are very kind, very good," the weeping girl said, rising, and clasping his hand with both hers. "I shall ever, ever be grateful to you."

Again that cold word! Sir William sighed, and looked at the ground, taking her little hands between his own, and putting them tenderly.

"Where is my mother?" Lily asked. "I must go to her."

"Stay," said Sir William. "I think you had better not go to her now. It would be best, I profit; she is under the care of a doctor, and tomorrow she may be better. Wait a little."

"No, no," said Lily; "let me go to her at once; it is my duty. She—she is my mother!"

"Let me accompany you, then," said the baronet; "you ought not to be of some service."

Lily accepted the offer with gratitude; and, taking her hand, Sir William led her, as he would lead a child, out of the dressing-room and along the dark passage into the shed, to which the insensible form of her mother had been removed.

It had been determined to take the injured woman to the Cottage at once, and four men were carrying her on the counterfeit pad-saddle. She was lying in a shapeless heap on the spring-board, which, as the horse-shoes of Sir William and Lily, hand in hand, followed the melancholy procession across the stone-paved yard, among the men and property-chariots, the horses showing their hind quarters through the open doors of the stables; out through the narrow stage-door of the circus, where the spring-board had scarcely room to turn; out into the gardens and down the broad walk among the colored lights flaring wearily and uncomfortably in their cups; under the gaunt and leafless trees, nodding their bare branches like the stalks of funeral plumes that had been arranged for their feathers; past the spectral ash-trees suspending their skeleton hands over the scene of sorrow; moving slowly among the whitewashed statues bathed from head to foot in greenish tears, wrung from that portion of blighted Nature which the moisture of winter misses desperately clinging to their verdure—the men passed along with their moaning burden to the Cottage.

Among those who walked by the side of the litter, and close to the figure that lay upon it, the baronet observed the strange-looking man he had noticed in the circus. He called Lily's attention to him, and asked if she knew who he was.

Lily started. She had seen that face before; she remembered it well; yet she could not tell when or where.

"Yes," she said, "I have seen him before—in Paris—no, not in Paris, before that, somewhere, somewhere."

While the girl was wondering, the men paused in the porch with their burden, until the door was opened by Mrs. Snuffburn. Mr. M'Variety took this opportunity to arrest the further progress of the crowd of idlers who had followed the litter through the gardens. When the countess had been carried in, he remained in the porch to prevent the mob from entering the house. The man with the gray hair and the dark eyebrows and mustache presented himself, and desired to be admitted.

"I can not allow you to pass," said the manager.

"I am a friend of the lady," said the stranger; "an old friend."

"Oh, no doubt," said the manager; "and I dare say the mob at your heels are all old friends of the lady, too."

"I assure you, Sir, I am speaking the truth," said the stranger, earnestly; "let me pass, I beseech you."

Sir William Long and Lily came up at this moment. The stranger no sooner saw Lily than he started, and, uttering an exclamation of surprise, held out his hands to her.

"Lily Floris! Lily Floris!" he exclaimed; "do you, can you remember me?"

Lily thanked the man in alarm.

"Do you really know this young lady?" asked the baronet.

"Yes, Sir," the stranger replied; "and her mother also. I am her oldest friend, one that once so deeply loved; to seek to stand beside her, perhaps in her last moments, and at her last trial. When I expected this hour, and required his kindness with ingratitude and scorn, he was yet willing to forgive her all. They carried her at once into the gilded apartment. It was blazing with light, and the table was laid for supper—that supper to which she had invited her former friends, promising to make a night of it and be gay.

The men, as they bore her into the room, stumbled against the table, and dishes of fruit that had been set upon the floor ready for the feast. They carried her at once into the next room, and were about to lift her upon the bed, when the surgeon, drawing aside the curtains, discovered that the bed-clothes had been prepared for Champagne bottles. These hastily removed, the injured woman was laid upon the bed. In a few more minutes appearances apparently lifeless, with the full blaze of the lights from the great chandelier falling upon her livid face.

The doctor, finding only a slight scalp wound over her temple, was inclined to think that her injuries were of a serious kind. His opinion seemed to be confirmed when she opened her eyes and looked about her calmly. But presently, when she drew a full breath, she put her hand to her side and uttered a cry of pain. This told the doctor that there were other internal hurts. He found that there were ribs broken than he had first imagined. He begged Mr. M'Variety to send for a surgeon to come to see her. This was done, and in the mean time the surgeon in attendance endeavored, with the assistance of Lily and Mrs. Snuffburn, to undress the patient. This, however, she resisted, waving them off with her hand, and groaning piteously every time she drew her breath.

When the other surgeon arrived a second attempt was made to undress her, but she screamed so desperately that the doctors were fain to desist. She lay with her eyes wide open, fixed and staring blankly; her breath was coming in short, quick gasps, and was very sharp in utterance and moan. The doctors felt her pulse, and looked at each other anxiously.

Lily watched the two doctors, interpreting their looks, stepped forward to ask their opinion of the case.

"I am afraid she is sinking," said the surgeon of whom he made the inquiry; "she has received some internal injury, and refuses to be moved."

Presently the countess turned her eyes full upon Lily, and, with a great effort, made a sign to her to approach.

The eyes of the woman were waiting for him, and when he came upon her view she held out her hand to him.

Constant sprang to the bedside, and, falling on his knees, took upon her view she held out her hand to him.

He had kissed that hand once before, when it was raised to strike him in the face with a whip and a mocking taunt. It was not drawn away from him now.

"Jean Baptiste Constant," she said, feebly, "I am dying; that beast has trodden the life out of me. Tell these people to retire, all but you and—and my child."

The doctors and Mrs. Snuffburn retired, and Constant and Lily were left alone by the bedside of the dying woman. They knelt down together beside her, and waited for her to speak. It was some time before she moved, or uttered a word. At length she raised her arm feebly, took Lily's hand, and placed it in that of Constant.

"Protect her," she said; "I leave her to your care."

"I accept the trust," Constant replied, solemnly.

After a pause the countess turned her eyes toward Lily and said, "Withdraw for a little and leave us—alone."

Lily rose from her knees, blinded with tears, kissed the dying face, danced, stepefied, filled with a strange wonder.

When the door was closed the countess roused herself a little, and grasped Constant's hand almost fiercely.

"Can you forgive me?" she said, despairingly. "Can you—can you forgive me?"

"Yes, yes," he said; "I can—I do!"

"All?" she asked, eagerly.

"All; every thing, every thing. Oh, Valérie, Valérie!"

"I have been very wicked, Jean Baptiste, very ungrateful, very cruel, very heartless; but it was not my fault. It was born in me, whipped into me, beaten into me with kicks and blows. The devil has been in me from my birth, and held possession of me from first to last. Had he left me for one moment I might have required your kindness and been your wife, and we might have been happy. But he came, and the child which possessed me made me proud, ambitious, ungrateful, and wicked, and he has burned me to—to this dreadful end among strangers in a foreign land. Had I been born with a good spirit in me, Jean Baptiste, I should have been good and virtuous, I should have been grateful, I should have returned your love and care, and we might have been happy now in France."

She paused frequently while she murmured these words, laying her hand upon her side, and moaning with a wail of anguish.

"Let me go on," she continued. "I have been very, very wicked; but could I help it, Jean Baptiste? can what great power only tares have been sown; can flowers spring up from a soil rank with the roots of weeds? You sent me to school to be taught, but I was to be good; but it was too late, the evil spirit came with my first breath. I have been possessed, Jean Baptiste, possessed most of your life. And now, O Heaven! what shall I do, what shall I do?"

A sudden paroxysm seized her, and she writhed about upon the bed-clothes as if she were struggling with death. When she grew calmer Constant took her hand gently, and said:

"Pray, Valérie; pray to Heaven to forgive you."

"I can not pray," she said. "It is so long since I have prayed. I have forgotten how to pray. Oh, what shall I do?" she groaned for breath, and again clutched at the bed-clothes fiercely.

Constant rose and went to the door and beckoned to Lily. She entered the room, with a scared look upon her face, timidly. Constant led her by the hand to lead her to the bedside. Her mother turned and saw her, and grasped at her hand as if for rescue.

"My child," she said, "you are good, you are innocent, you have learned to pray; pray for me, pray for me!" She drew Lily's head toward her own, and implored her with kisses.

And Lily knelt down by the bedside, clasped her hands, and prayed for her mother, looking upward through her tears, and beseeching God to pardon her all her sins for the Saviour's sake. The worn, crushed, hardened woman caught at the last blessed words of the prayer and repeated them again and again, eagerly clinging to them with failing breath and faltering tongue, until she floated away from earth upon the raft of promise which her child had launched into the sea of her despair.

CHAPTER LVII.

DUST TO DUST.

LILY was once more Quite Alone—alone with her dead mother in the Cottage in the Gardens of Bacchus.

The mystery of her mother's dying words had been explained to her by Jean Baptiste Constant. He repeated it to her in many merciful reservations, the Idyll of Marouille-le-Geney, which the reader knows. Lily was rather afraid of this strange-looking man at first; but when she knew all, and heard from his trembling lips the story of his early love for her mother, of his devotion to her, and of his care for herself even in the days of her childhood, she gave him her complete confidence, and accepted his guardianship gladly. How dear now was that he had been a father to her—the only father she had ever had. Constant was anxious—eagerly anxious—that she should at once leave the Cottage and take up her abode at Pomeroy's Hotel in Great Grand Street, which he was the proprietor. Sir William Long also urged her to leave the Cottage and go to Pomeroy's. But she declined to accept the latter proposal gratefully stranger had ascended the stairs and entered the room before Mr. M'Variety had finished speaking.

"Mr. M'Variety," he said, "we received this check the other day from Madame Ernesta, in payment of a wine bill; we gave her a receipt and the change out of it, and to-day the check has been returned from the bank marked 'no effects.' In fact, Sir, it has been dishonored."

"What is the amount, and whose check is it?" the manager said.

"It is a check for twenty pounds," said the man, "and it is signed 'Edgar Greyfaunt.'"

Lily looked crimson.

"There must be some mistake," said the manager. "Mr. Greyfaunt is a man of fortune; you'd better make inquiries again."

"It would save us much trouble, Sir," said the man, "if you could pay the money."

"Oh, I can't do that," said the manager; "it's no affair of mine, you know, and—"

"Stay," said Sir William Long (let us have no more words about the matter." And he took out his pocket-book and handed the man notes for the amount of the check.

"Now, Sir, you may go."

The man put the dishonored check on the table, took up the notes, and left the room.

Mr. Edgar Greyfaunt had paid more for his box than any of the others, but his check was worth only the value of the paper upon which it was written.

Mr. Thomas Tuttlesbell triumphed in his secret soul.

"The insolent Brummagem puppy!" he muttered between his teeth.

Mr. Tuttlesbell's only regret was, that the solemnity of the occasion forbade him to give audible expression to his satisfaction. But he could be restrained himself for the moment, he could not leave without easing his soul by a commentary on Greyfaunt's shabby conduct. It was to Lily that he made the remark.

"I always thought that fellow, Greyfaunt, was an impostor," he said, "and now I've proved it. Wasn't it good of Sir William to pay the money and save the fellow's credit with the box-lot? And without a word, too! Ah, Sir William is a real gentleman, my dear, with a big heart."

Honest Thomas! he knew not the conflict of painful emotions which these words aroused in Lily's fluttering breast.

Under the direction of Sir William Long the funeral was conducted as plainly and privately as possible. As much and unprecedented publicity—much to Mr. M'Variety's regret, for he now felt that he was losing a magnificent advertisement for the opening of the summer season—attended the dull Vandrien Valerie, once the bright particular star of the Paris theatres, the reigning queen among the demi-monde of her day, the darling of the slaver of hearts, and the wife of Francis Blunt, Esquire, an English gentleman of high lineage and ancient name, but of very little else besides.

As much and unprecedented publicity—much to Mr. M'Variety's regret, for he now felt that he was losing a magnificent advertisement for the opening of the summer season—attended the dull Vandrien Valerie, once the bright particular star of the Paris theatres, the reigning queen among the demi-monde of her day, the darling of the slaver of hearts, and the wife of Francis Blunt, Esquire, an English gentleman of high lineage and ancient name, but of very little else besides.

Her grave had been dug at Kensal Green by order of Mr. M'Variety, who, contemplating an open-air and evening of circus horses, was desirous that the route might be as long as possible: on the principle of the longer the route the better the advertisement.

Sir William Long did not join the procession at the gardens, but drove down by himself, early, and waited among the tombstones for its arrival. It was a fine, clear, frosty day, and the sun shone out cheerfully. Sir William wandered about among the monuments, thoughtful and moody. It was almost a new scene to him, for he had rarely stood among graves and felt the chastening influence which the contemplation of death exercises upon thoughtful minds. He was surprised to find himself musing upon the looking death in the face in his own dominion, calmly and without fear; nay, almost envying those who slept so peacefully under ground, alone. What was it that had so subdued the heart of this man of fashion, this pleasure-loving bachelor, with the gay delights of life at the top of his command, with ample wealth, with health and strength, and many days yet before him? What was it? It could not be that he had the genuine love of the heart, which is akin to all that is pure and holy, that love which is almost a repetition in itself of which sanctifies all things, and is a witness to the divine likeness in which man was made, and is the image of Him whose face that hovered about him, brightening the scene and robbing the graves of their terror. How he loved her, oh, so tenderly, so purely, with all his heart and with all his soul! He had led a gay, reckless life, and though in the pursuit of his pleasures he had never known the love or cruel, or mean, he knew and felt that he had much to answer for. But that account seemed to be redeemed by the purifying influence of the love which now filled his breast. He felt that he was a better man for it.

Sir William was startled from his reflections by a noise of wheels on the gravel-path behind him. It was the funeral procession with all of the countess, followed by the two mourning-coaches. He helped Lily from her coach, and stood beside her at the mouth of the grave. Constant stood on the other side of her, and took her hand, and as dust was cast upon dust, and ashes were deposited upon ashes, Lily's little Constant looked down into the grave of hopes long since blighted, long since dead, hopes that had been born and nursed in the quiet village of Marouille-le-Gency, far away in France, but which now lay here in a foreign land, buried forever. Was it in mercy to his blank and desolate heart that the sun burst from a passing cloud and fell upon the coffin, lighting up the name upon the plate as with a halo of glory—a promise of hope hereafter?

Sir William walked by Lily's side to the coach and helped her in. He held out his hand to her, and she took it and pressed it warmly.

"A new life! What did he mean by those words? Lily knew not as yet; but to his last entreaty she replied, with proud reserve,

"I will ever think of you, ever love you, ever be grateful to you."

And, seated in the mourning coach beside Ann Bogbie of Constant, she was carried away to her new home.

NO GHOST.

I don't know how people feel who have seen a ghost; perhaps it would be a relief to them to find out the white gentleman attended a broomstick; but for myself, I once saw a figure in a sheet which it would be an infinite relief to me to believe a ghost. I saw this figure, or thought I saw it, three or four years ago, when I was lodging in the second-floor of a house in Bloom Street. There were at the time unfurnished rooms to be let on the second floor of the opposite house. The blinds were not drawn up, so that, before the workmen came to do any, I could see into two of these empty rooms. That opposite my own was an inner room, lighted by two windows, and entered only from the adjoining small ante-chamber, and this, which also looked into the street, had one window. The proof was,

That I saw it.

I was there for so many months that it grew yellow with age and gray with dirt, and it was hanging in shapeless and unsightly folds over a single window when the rooms were taken: at least I concluded that they were taken, for the bill disappeared before, and was not replaced after, the two days' work a few days the windows were cleaned, and a bed and two chairs were placed in the inner room. There were no curtains and no carpet. I saw for as I could see, any other furniture in these two rooms. But there was some one in the bed, very if I imagined, for although I saw the figure more than once, I never saw it sitting up, or saw the bed empty, or saw the face so as to recognize if it was the same person.

In any case I should not have been able to see much of those opposite neighbors, for I was at home in the morning and evening, and they had their rooms besides the two I have mentioned.

About a fortnight after the lodgers came, I was sitting near my window in the early morning when my attention was attracted by a figure at the window of the ante-room, standing with its back to it, and in a white sheet. A corner of the sheet was drawn up round the head and hung over the face like a veil, so that I could not distinguish the looking out of window, no trace of form or feature could be seen; and the arms, which were crossed, were the slightly curved arms of a child. The sheet ends it paused at the window, and I, sitting partly behind my window curtain, could see without being seen. There was nothing particularly curious in which I could see very distinctly, as the windows were open.

But here it seems necessary to state that the effect produced upon me at the time by this person in a sheet has been considerably modified by events subsided horror from circumstances which occurred later. It is difficult to describe that which follows without appearing to exaggerate, and, in fact, so far as I can remember, I was not sensible of it at the time, and felt only a strange attraction and interest in a figure which I could see so distinctly, and pay the fool at 7 o'clock in the morning.

The figure, as I have said, entered the inner room, and stood for a few minutes at the window by the bedside. Then slowly the arms were stretched out, pointing at something or some one in the bed; the head, still covered by the sheet, was turned in that quarter; the whole attitude was that of one speaking with an earnest and eager intensity. But soon there was a change. The arms were drawn in, and acted, as in a wild trance, and commenced leaping and dancing round the bed. The figure then disappeared for a moment at the foot of it, and then springing first to one side and then to the other with such wonderful agility that it was impossible to follow its movement. At length there was a pause; again the hands and arms were stretched out, again they pointed, and, as I thought, at the bed; it turned, they, to the bed; and then the body swayed and bent backward, and the head was thrown up in one long burst of exultation. From these signs, and that I could hear the mocking sounds even above all the noises in the street. I do not know if I should say I heard them, or if the sounds were borne down, but I remember my surprise at finding that I could hear the laughter, and was again standing at the window of the ante-room. From these it passed out into the passage, and I saw no more of it.

The bed was, as usual, occupied, but I do not remember noticing any movement on the part of the occupier.

Early in the summer evening I returned from my daily work and sat at the window to watch the sun, as like a huge ball of fire it sank in the misty mist and smoke with a dim angry light, it sank down into the heart of the great city. The blinds of the room opposite were drawn down, and the windows were closed, and they remained so on the following morning and in the evening, as I watch, and from my window in the dusk, I saw two men coming down the street, bearing on their shoulders a long, heavy box, apparently in process of being carried the coffin in and up the stairs, and through the ante-room, and into that room with the bed, which was opposite to mine. I saw the shadow of it cast upon the white window blinds; for some one went first, carrying a candle.

About then I knew that there was death in the room, and that the antic which had mocked and made sport on the previous day had mocked at the dying or the dead.

The following day was Sunday, and I was again at my window when the plain deal coffin was carried down stairs and put into a shabby hearse. This was followed by a street cab, and one small person sprang quickly into it, closely muffled in a large black cloak. I could not tell whether this person was young or old, and could only guess whether it was man or woman; but something in the rapid resolute movements at once recalled the sheeted figure which had startled me three days before. I could not watch the house again, it was too terrible; and on the following day when I returned from my work, the bed had been removed, the windows were wide open, and there were new bills, announcing that the rooms were "To Let, Unfurnished."

INTERESTING ITEMS.

COLONEL CAMPBELL, in his Indian Journal, tells a story of an old woman named Kate Carmichael, who made her living by doctoring the natives of India. She married upon George III., who then ruled the land, much in the same way as Napoleon I. now rules over the Emperor of Russia—as a ruthless tyrant, who would not allow honest people to manufacture their own grain after their own fashion, and devotedly prayed for his death accordingly.

At last the news of old King's demise reached the Highlands, and Kate, rejoicing in the death of the tyrant, determined to go off to York, in her own house, on a broad daylight. The natural consequence was an early visit from the Excisemen, who found the still as a busy as ever.

Kate did not see this; as, seizing a pitchfork which lay ready to her hand, she drove him into a corner, and kept him at bay, while the whole neighborhood flocked to assist, exclaiming—"Kill his brains: stick the rascal. He'll never tell a tale of Kate Carmichael."

Her idea was that, the moment the King died, all law, as far as Highland matters concerned, ceased; and the neighbors being pretty much of the same mind, the excisemen was left to his fate, and Kate's still worked away as still unused.

It appears in the Spectator pronounces the following religion as here:—"We been are an organized polity, a Church established by Government, in no doubt were than Turks or Chinamen from Christians, but were not the less Christians, and members of the Church, common time; in a word, all persons even more distinctly than we are members of the Church of England. Now the law our sins and we theirs, what would they think of us? Can we suppose that God would allow a bum; our finest flights of eloquence to a rather louder than than usual; our manly sense, our honest hearts, our sincere piety, our earnest industry, to serve, as far as they could see, curiously base and, our honor and integrity, our incomplete sense of propriety; our relations to one another as being almost incomprehensible? Would they not see in the very fact that, with the exception of one or two varieties of the intellectual, we were all of one sex, one female, all one nation as below the pales of a lee of the world to understand. Perhaps some of them would think that the most precious life and die in a garret in the attempt to fathom the mystery. Others would be merely and curious little bragged and two-headed insect man; but the vocation of the pulpit reminded bee would hid her attend to very much higher matters."

MARRYING AGES.—The recorded statistics for three years in the ages at which persons were married in England and Wales present some interesting and curious subjects for remark. The register books for 1839, from the following statistical observations are drawn are three for 1839, 1860, and 1861. The number of marriages in 1839 was 122,093; in 1860, 154,832. Up to the age of 20 a much greater proportion of women are married than of men. Of 100 men 20 years of age were married, and a much greater proportion of old men between 80 and 90 years of age were married than of old women. Of 100 persons there were 73 girls married at 15 years of age, but no boys were. Of 100 persons married at 16 years, 2 were boys and 63 girls of the same age who took the step. The greatest number of boys married at any age was 21 years, of 100 ladies. At 25 and 30 the proportion is greater of the men than they were. From 1860 to 1861, 106,351 and 106,634. A Bronze Archbishop.—Soon after Whitsuntide a report arose in an country house of Still-Organ the bay was ripe, and a number of men were called in to mow and make it. The men, when they came, proceeded to refresh themselves at the food which the Archbishop supplied when Whitsuntide arrived. "Now, my men," exclaimed he to them, "I am your House," replied several, "I'm a-going that the next will be a-going to be a-going to be a-going to

A YEAR'S COURTSHIP.

I saw her, Harry, first, in March—
You know the street that leadeth down
By the old bridge's crumbling arch?—
Just where it leaves the dusty town.

A lonely house stands grim and dark—
You've seen it? Then I need not say
How quaint the place is. Did you mark
An ivied window? Well! one day,

I, chasing some forgotten dream,
And in a poet's idlest mood,
Caught, as I passed, a white hand's gleam—
A shutter opened—there she stood!

Training the ivy to its prop.
Two dark eyes and a brow of snow
Flashed down on me—did I stop?—
She says I did—I do not know.

But all that day did something glow
Just where the heart beats; frail and slight,
A germ had slipped its shell, and now
Was pushing softly for the light.

May came, and on that arch, sweet mouth,
The smile was graver in its play,
And, softening with the softening south,
My April melted into May.

She loved me, yet my heart would doubt,
And ere I spoke the month was June—
One word—I told her so—and out
To watch a slowly setting moon.

Something which I saw not—my eyes
Were not on heaven—a star perchance,
Or some high flyer of the skies,
Had caught her earnest, upward glance.

And as she paused—Ha! we have played
Upon the very spot—a fir
Just reached me with its dreamy shade,
But the full moonlight fell on her.

And as she paused—I know not why—
I longed to speak, yet could not speak;
The bashful ice that lobbed—I—
I stooped and gently kissed her cheek.

A murmur (she some fragrant air Stirred softly) and the faintest start—
O Hal! we were the happiest pair
O Hal! I caught her heart to heart!

And kissed away some tears that crushed;
But how she trembled, timid dove!
When my soul broke its silence, flushed
With a whole burning June of love.

Since then a happy year hath sped
Through all the sunshine that seemed all June and May,
And soon a March sun, evershed,
Will usher in the crowning day.

Twelve blessed moons that seemed to glow
All sweetness. Hal!—my peerless Kate!
She is the dearest! Angels!—Pray
Thank God!—but you shall see her—wait.

So, all is told! I count on thee
To see the priest, Hal! Pass the wine!
Here's to the darling wife to be!
And here's to—when thou find'st her—thine!

STAINLESS HILDEGARDE.

THIS wild and mournful story opens cheerily enough, the sky seems cloudless but for the single speck, not bigger than one's hand, which is to grow into the blighting thunder-cloud. Charlemagne is now dwelling in his royal palace-hall at Aix-la-Chapelle, blessed in the love of his beautiful wife Hildegarde, yet it is not long since he has figured in a dark story.

His wife sister, Bertha, had chosen him a bride, Ermengarde, daughter of the Lombard king. He had married her in spite of the Pope's prohibition, and not long after one year of childless wedlock. The ill-fated lady died soon after, some said of a broken heart. But the details of their story, their short union, and its cruel ending, are shrouded in gloom. In the year 771 he married Hildegarde, of good old Swabian stock; and lady and husband as noble, why such a one as she married a man who had just set aside another wife is equally a mystery.

For a few years all went well with Hildegarde and Charlemagne, they dwelt in peace and love together, and she bore him three sons, Karl, Pepin, and Louis, and as many daughters, Hildrud, Bertha, and Gisela. The great Emperor was prone to anger, if roused to thoroughly, but in the main he was both unsuspecting, trustful, and loving; toward Hildegarde; her great influence was not founded on mere beauty, though she was fair and stately, with that lofty and calm loveliness which lies deeper than rounded limbs, bright eyes, and rosy cheeks. A tender, loving, God-fearing woman, she was compelled her husband toward mercy and goodness, thus winning the love and reverence of all, from the highest to the meanest in the land. Then there was one other influence to be compared to hers, the subtle, hidden sway of Talaud, a half-brother of Charlemagne's. The Emperor loved him, and never saw the black soul that lay hidden under a fair exterior. In fifty years Hildegarde's large pleading for justice and mercy thwarted the crafty Talaud's selfish plans. His greed of power prompted him often to plot the downfall of this guileless, unsuspecting woman; and compass it too—that he might better rule her husband's mind. But every time he gazed on her regal beauty and listened to her pleasant speech his heart would fail him, gradually his resolves grew weaker, till, bit by bit, they yielded to an accursed love.

He loved her blindly, desperately, and the devil of ambition whispered in his ear that Hildegarde, ruined and degraded, would for her own sake beware how she crossed his plans. With this foul treason in his heart he was outwardly the loving kinsman of the royal pair, and their most faithful vassal.

The three actors in my story were thus circumstanced toward each other when Charlemagne was called away to the Saxon wars: his last act was to appoint his half-brother to the government of Aix-la-Chapelle. As he tore himself from Hildegarde's embrace, half the bitterness of parting was lost in the thought of what a safe protector he had found her. Little he knew, as he pledged away all his champions, that he had intrusted his fold to the ravenous wolf.

Darker and darker grows the plot of the story. At first the stainless lady, so unsuspecting in her purity, treated Talaud almost as a brother, and he dreaded to break the charm of their frank intercourse. Still, somehow a vague distrust would come over her, to be quelled the next moment as a base lending to her husband's dear friend and kinsman. At last, however, she could not help noting something strange in the demeanor of this man, who hung on her accents, gazed into her face, and haunted her like her shadow. She chafed inwardly at this close watching, and gently reasoned with herself for her husband's coming. One day she had dismissed her maidens, and was sitting all alone in the upper chamber of one of the towers. She was idly wandering vaguely over the new city and the green fields below, her hands lay idle on her lap, and a wistful, tender look softened the fire of her beautiful face, for her thoughts were far away with him whom she so dearly loved. Talaud stole to her unheard and bowed over her. His dark shadow fell across her, and she started from her day-dream. Their eyes met in full gaze, and they silently stare. She would have risen to go, but he grasped her hands and fell on his knees before her, and then at last, in the quiet of day, poured forth his long tale of passion. Dumb with horror and surprise, she sat like a graven image till he paused from sheer lack of breath. Then she spoke. Slow and low she broke from him, and turned on the false knave with righteous wrath. He quailed beneath her withering scorn, and shrank away, cowering, crushed. He might have left that room her open foe, but for one glance back while his foot was yet on the threshold. Hildegarde had risen, her eyes, and nostrils, and with clenched hands and dilated nostrils; her lips still quivering, her whole attitude showing a most worthily light, terrible as a young Judith: but more beautiful than ever. One long lingering look at her fatal beauty, and Taland's fury turned again to fierce-accursed love.

The next day and the next again he dogged her footsteps at all hours, but she held him aloof. Weeks and months rolled on and still no change. The more Hildegarde shrank from him the more he pursued her. She locked her doors in the face of his hated presence, every barrier she strove to place between them, gave way before his superior cunning. At last secret hands were busied on some noxious crawling thing, but dared not show it, lest men should say, "Why?" And proud queen Hildegarde would have died before she would put it in their power to say that she had listened to such a love-tale. She would have preferred to bear with her weary head on some kind woman's bosom and sob out her story, but she dared not. She bore in silence her load of misery, her bosom friend, her fear, and none knew that many a night her pillow was wet with the sobbing tears she dared not shed in the open day. Her life was a burden to her: she felt like the bird which sees the writhing snake close by, but can not fly from its fascination. The very sight of the frightful monster on the wall, visibly height of the great tower, filled her with horrible temptation. She would have given her misery and save her honor with one thrust of the glittering steel, one bound from the lofty battlements. But Hildegarde was a brave woman, and could not think other chance was left her she could not shed her own blood.

Goaded to desperation, when every other means had failed her, she met Taland with his own weapons, craft and daring. She no longer shunned him, but met him day and night with a smile. In her utter coldness, may, she even schooled herself to greet him with smiles and honeyed words. This change filled him with tumultuous joy. He believed that day she bade him prepare three lonely rooms in a remote and unfrequented wing of the castle, adding as he was to have the keys of the doors leading to bolts and bars, and to come to her when all was ready. Taland placed her in an ecstasy of delight, never heeding that the hand he covered with burning kisses was as cold and rigid as stone, nor how the word upon the smiles, how hollow the tones of her gracious farewell.

For three whole days she was rid of Taland: three days she passed in the solitude of misery and moody packings along the battlements. She ate little, spoke less, and wandered through the palace like a soul lingering in the grave, and where I have said that she lies dying in some wretched but I will go to her, my eyes shall fear on her death-throes, and my hand bear witness between her and her God. Instead of prayers she will die with curses of me on her lips, and I will have to see that beauty, which I beheld me, gone from the outcast, who will die gaunt and ghastly, worn to skin and bone." And a hunter Taland will chuckle to himself over the visions he conjured up.

Before he had been many days in durance, great shouting and cheering in the streets made him rush to the window, cursing the high court-yard walls. Suddenly the great gates of the castle were swung back, and in burst the mob, pressing close round a horseman, whose steed was bloody and flecked with foam. He waved a sealed packet, and shouted, "Glorious news!" A tall lady appeared at a window and beckoned him with her hand. He dug the spurs into his panting, heaving flanks, and rode through the crowd. Hung the reins to the nearest man, and bounding past guard and usher, soon knelt at the lady's feet and gave her the precious scroll. Long before a scribe had been fetched to decipher it, Hildegarde learned from the soldier that the Saxons were vanquished, that many thousands had embraced the Christian faith, and better than all, that her husband was unharmed in life or limb, and returning as fast as he could lead his host.

Words can not tell the true wife's joy. She dismissed and rewarded the soldier, and made the learned man read the Emperor's letter again and again, till she knew every loving line; and, childlike in her joy, she pressed it to her lips and to her heart, kissing mark and seal, and thanking God from the bottom of her heart. She was too thoroughly happy to think that she should meet the shadow of her meeting with her husband, she felt as though it would be a sin to damp his double bliss of triumph and return with the new sorrow of his half-brother's foul treason, and that moment she resolved to free Taland. Too pure herself to know that black ingratitude finds its own shelter in guilt, she never thought that he would turn on her; besides, she deemed that even he had no gratitude, reward for his own bond would make him doubt. To an evil mind she gave the traitor his freedom.

Charlemagne returned, and for one short week Hildegarde was entirely happy—so happy, perhaps. Before the end of another week he one day entered into her chamber with clouded brow, and half recoiled as she sprang to his arms, but he checked himself, and caught her face in his two hands, and looked her full calmly, and sadly into her eyes. The scrawl passed from his face as he gazed into those clear frank eyes, he kissed her pure forehead, pressed her to his heart, and left her chamber. That morning Taland had begun his task, and before the noon and evening cast of the true wife's face had banished his hints from the Emperor's mind.

Taland now saw that he must give up his vengeance or his life, and desperate game, indeed, he chose; yet he was very wary. He said nothing tangible, yet he dropped words that rankled for whole days in his husband's heart. Charlemagne would not stand it any longer, and bluntly bade him speak out.

Taland began with well-feigned reluctance. First came speeches about what was due to his royal brother's honor, and how loud was the duty he, Taland, as his kin, owed to the king man, till by-and-by, with almost tears, the false knave cunningly unfolded his tale, half hinting, then affirming, his charge. Charlemagne's indignant ear was the young lord. He saw his dupe's voice, and, thus encouraged, went with double zeal, and with well-acted grief and sweet love passages. He said he had once come on the lovers, who but at his approach. Next morning he had found Hildegarde in a close parley with one whole court know of his captivity? Then the meaning of vague hints and jests he had heard banded about Hildegarde's name. He certainly never had across Charlemagne, and he believed all. His rage broke forth in frenzied paroxysms, till Taland ceased, covered his face with his hands, and Charlemagne stopped his frantic mutterings, and buried his head in his hands. Taland could see his huge frame heaving, and the great knots in her hair twitching as he stand out like straining cords. The Emperor looked up, and, though the breath came hissing through his set teeth, his face was calm, but that rigid livid calmness was horrible to see.

"Call her!" he said.

Taland started at that awful sound, though it was scarce spoken above a whisper. He bade a guard call the Queen, and came back to stand against the Emperor's chair, though Charlemagne hardly seemed aware of his presence.

Hildegarde was playing with her little children when the messenger came. She went joyfully, and the little toddling things came racing after her, with their short skirts flapping, and clutching themselves, and leaving them with the guards in the ante-hall, passed in. The smile was still on her lips as she came toward her lord, but the sight of his stony face and Taland leaning over his shoulder struck a chill to her very heart.

Slowly he waved her off. "Hildegarde, minion, quit me forever." The words, the tone, smote her like a hard blow. She staggered forward, then turned to his feet and faced her. Their eyes met, his flashing fire, hers wildly beseeching but not quailing. "Speak, woman, be merciful!"

A convulsive shudder ran through her limbs, she gasped for breath, and strove to speak, but no sound passed her white lips. Then Taland, with a sneer, said, persuasively, to Charlemagne: "Why force the dame to criminate herself?"

The taunt brought him round Hildegarde from stupor to almost madness. She grasped her husband's arm, and lifted her right hand to heaven. "Charlemagne," she cried, "do call on God to witness—"

Ere she could say another word he dashed her from him. "Blasphemous traitress, thou deservest death, but still I can not slay thee. This day leave my sight and my dominions forever, quit my realm. Woe betide thee if thou darest ever again set foot within its bounds."

She glared at him fiercely defiant: that moment she could have killed the man who doubted her: the next she thought on Pilate's judgment-hall, and what the Lord had borne between her and her God. Instead of prayers she will die with curses of me on her lips, and I will have to see that beauty, which I beheld me, gone from the outcast, who will die gaunt and ghastly, worn to skin and bone." And a hunter Taland will chuckle to himself over the visions he conjured up.

Hung the reins to the nearest strain them to her breast for the last time. Taland stepped between. The little creatures stretched out their little arms, and struggled in his grasp. One shriek broke from Hildegarde, more like the death-groan of some stricken wild thing than the cry of a woman, and she fled from the palace.

The rest of her flight we recalled her fanatic. She marked the wondering stare of the people in the streets, and remembered that she was hurrying on alone and unveiled. A church door stood open, and she entered with no thought but to take refuge from their gaze. She sank on her knees before the altar, and strove to pray, but she could neither think nor pray. Her brain reeled, her eyeballs burned, and in the blood tears came in drops. Slowly the truth dawned upon her that she was a wanderer on the face of the earth, an, and branded with infamy more degraded than the wretchedest outcast in the land. She thought of her husband and of the days of their early love, she thought of the helpless children she had left exposed to Taland's wiles, and she sank down on the altar steps, wringing her hands and moaning piteously. She sat thus for hours, half stupefied, till roused by actual bodily discomfort. She was literally choking with thirst. She tottered feebly from the church into a yard behind, where she saw a clear well. Stooping to drink, she beheld her image in the water, and started at the sight. Her costly robes, her jeweled hair, shone in ghastly mockery of a face wan and drawn already, as from whole years of woe. She had done the work of years, yet she gazed unmoved on the wreck of her loveliness. That cared for the glorious shape of her youth when he who had loved that beauty was lost to her forever?

To slake her burning thirst she had filled her two hands at the well; raising the water to her lips, her eyes fell on two rings, the wedding ring and the royal betrothal. At such a moment these pledges of a severed bond smote her to the heart. Wildly she strove to drag them off, but her trembling fingers failed her. As they tightened on the golden circlets her thoughts rushed back to her wedding-day, and the vows then spoken, that nothing can cancel but death. "I am his wife, his own true wife, till death do us divide," she murmured. This new ray of comfort came like a heavenly sunbeam to the dark night of her anguish, and she wept. When tears had somewhat eased her heart she began to think and act. She pulled off her gems, all but the two rings, wrapped face and figure in her mantle, and thus disguised, ventured into the street. Her pale beauty befriended her, and she gained unnoticed the shelter of a friendly roof, where she found also means of changing some of her gems for money. On the verge of the morning she started on her long wanderings. Fly she must from her husband's realm, and by forced and tedious journeys she gained the Austrian Swabia, the province she had quitted as mighty and as happy a woman as ever the sun shone on. Her sister, the Countess Adeline, received the poor wanderer with open arms, fully believing in her purity.

Hildegarde might have passed the sad remnant of her days with her own people, but somehow their very pity galled her, and the indignation they expressed against her husband, ill though he had treated her, stung her to the quick. Besides, how could she, with such a blight on her life, dwell in her sister's house, where the sight of her own children damped all mirth? Her bleeding heart recoiled from all earthly solace, and the passionate love lavished on them had all spurned it turned to her Maker. Deprived of her husband and her little children, the poor lady's pent-up tenderness vented itself on the sick and the needy. And when she found herself a kill-joy in her sister's lonely home, that sweet sister's prompter bade her consecrate herself to a life of self-abnegation and piety. She could not bear to stay in her father-land, so replete with memories. Despite the Countess's entreaties she left her, and again set out on her lonely pilgrimage.

This time Rome, the great home of Christianity, was her goal. She crossed the snow-clad Alps, the burning plains of Italy, and took up her abode in the great city.

She spent her whole time in prayer and fasting and tending the sick. Filth, squalor, disease, had no terrors for her. Where wretches covered with sores and crawling vermin were tended by her royal hands. Anguish, blasphemy, despair, all horrors of body and soul that can bring recoil and shudder never daunted her; nay, in softening the pangs of others she found a balm for her own. Diseases seemed to yield to her skill or her prayers, none could tell which. Numbers of sick, particularly those afflicted with fever, were healed by her, and even some blind people regained their sight through her means. Do what she would, these cures could not remain hidden long, and as she glided along on her errands of mercy men pointed her out to each other, gazing reverently on the wan beauty of her earnest face, and calling down God's choicest blessings on the banished northern queen. Pilgrims from her own land saw her and heard of her cures, and returning to their people at home.

For a short time Taland enjoyed the full triumph of his wickedness, but, by some strange visitation, his hitherto keen sight began to fail him, and his life was rendered wretched by a painful and loathsome disorder in the eyes. The royal physicians employed all their herbs and simples to no purpose. The voice of conscience, stifled in happier hours, now thundered him without ceasing. As, sick and alone, he sat in the gloom of darkened chambers, brooding on that helpless blindness fast growing on him, he seemed to fancy that Hildegarde's face peered at him from the darkness, not as he had last seen it, touching in its patient anguish, but with mocking and gibing, now glaring at him fiercely triumphant. He could not sleep at night, and fifty times he started from his bed to grope his way to his brother's room, tell all, and be quit of his victim's haunting presence, were the moment of avowal to be his last. But when he came to the point he would chide himself for such sickly fancies, and go on stoutly, bearing his burden of guilt. He kept his own counsel till the last glimmer of sight had left him, and he was stone-blind. Then the pilgrims' tales of Hildegarde's wonderful cures kept constantly recurring to his mind. To be healed by her, even at the cost of having to confess his guilt, became his ruling wish. He was so sick of life, such as his then was, that he cared little about putting it in jeopardy for the chance of seeing once more. It was with feelings of intense relief he heard that business of great import summoned Charlemagne to Rome. Taland so besought him to let him go with him that the Emperor could bring himself to refuse his entreaties; though, in truth, the great Emperor was sorely puzzled to know how Hildegarde, if guilty, could be in league with God that He should grant her the gift of healing; and, if innocent, how she could be induced to cure Taland, who had hunted her down as the hound hunts the quarry.

No sooner was the Emperor and his train reached Rome than Taland sent to seek after Hildegarde, whose lonely dwelling was easily found. Cunning as he was, he did not know that his footsteps were dogged, and that his too trusting brother had at last begun to suspect him. Taland had himself guided to the dilapidated cottage where his victim had fixed her abode. His attendants had left him, and he deemed himself alone in the great city, where the sick used to assemble for prayer. He little knew who had tracked him thither, and stood but a few paces behind him. They were alone, and at a signal as Charlemagne could do to keep his hands off Taland, and force an avowal from him. However, he continued insensible, but his breathing could not escape the blind man's hearing; "Who is there?" said Taland. There was no reply. But thus warned of the danger, the wily Charlemagne stepped warily into the deep shadow of a pillared door. These two men waited minutes, which to them seemed hours, then they heard the voice of Hildegarde—wan, worn, but beautiful, with the peace of God beaming from her face—stood before them. She did not know Taland, but stood back with his back to the light, and face and figure muffled in a cloak.

"Poor man!" said she, in the Frankish tongue, "they tell me thou comest from the father-land; I know you speak my native tongue."

"Lady, they are well, for love of them I beseech thee heal me."

"Good God, man! art thou Taland?" cried the lady, springing toward him. She pulled the mantle down, and scanned his face. One searching look, and also was rushing from her lips, but he clutched her gown, and fell down on his knees.

"Unhand me, Taland!"

Still he held her gown. "Oh, lady, hear me for the Saviour's sake? God has judged between us, and he struck me blind; but if thou ask Him, he will give me sight. Have pity on a poor man!"

She stood motionless, and he let go her gown, and grovelled at her feet.

"Blind—helpless—she murmured; "blind—helpless—for the Saviour's sake." She said his words again, like some one dreaming. Then she roused striving to recall her import, to realize the change that made her bitterest foe a suppliant at her feet. Then, with a low, wailing cry, she bade Evil Ever go to thee that hast stolen my husband's love and rift me of my little ones?"

The blind man heard the words spoken words. Wildly, despairingly, he called out:

"Woman, hast thou no mercy? Hildegarde, look at me! Shout curses on me, but heal me! I wreck I am now, and all thy doing. Why didst thou spare my love until it grew so very hate, and for revenge I forged the lie that has made thy good name from thee; and then because of this great wrong to thee God smote me in his wrath. Oh, Hildegarde, by that fierce love I bore thee, that love mine own undoing as it too was thine, I conjure thee heal me. Let me see my wife, but once more, then tell thy lord my treason. Kill me if thou will, but let me see the blessed light of day before I die."

"Taland," replied the lady, and her voice was soft and low, "fear naught from me; I have pardoned thee this many a day. Rise, and, if thou hast faith, perchance God will heal thee, and I too will pray that He may."

"Hildegarde, Hildegarde, God in heaven bless thee! Ask Him. He loves thee, He can not refuse thy prayer."

Hildegarde sank on her knees beside him, and prayed with her face hid in her hands. So dead was the silence Charlemagne could hear the very throbbing of his heart. He could not pray for her feet, and lay one wasted hand on Taland's head. She stood at last, and clasped the lady to his breast. Heaven, and Taland, with helpless outstretched arms, cowered before her, quivering in every limb.

"Sweet Saviour," cried the lady, "heal him for thy mercy's sake!"

Straightway the scales dropped from his eyes, and Taland saw.

With a cry of delight he grasped her hands to press them to his lips, but suddenly they turned cold as stone, and fell from his nerveless grasp. Starting to his feet, he turned round—the Emperor stood behind him. Charlemagne sprang forward, clutched his sword, and charged the lady to his breast. Taland was stealing off. The stern mandate, "Stir at thy peril!" arrested him.

Tenderly the Emperor raised his wife's head from his shoulder and wiped away her happy tears. "My sweet wife, tell me all," he whispered; "trust all to my true love."

In broken words the lady told her story. Rage, grief, and wonder filled the Emperor's soul. He cursed his own blind folly, and again and again besought her pardon for the most grievous wrong that he had done her, his own true wife, the stainless mother of his children, the dearest thing he owned on earth. Loving looks and sweet caresses sealed his early pardon, and Taland was forgotten for a while. But even bliss could not long blot out the memory of his deed. The Emperor's own remorse would doubly ready to crush the vile slanderer whose tool he had been. He broke from Hildegarde, and in his fury would have struck Taland dead at her feet, but she threw herself between them. Her clinging arms held him back till her soft words melted his wrath. She so brought him to spare Taland's life he had not the heart to gainsay her, and sentence of death was changed to life-long banishment.

No words can portray the Emperor's glad return to his new city with his own true wife. The people, who had cherished her memory, rent the air with shouts of joy as she came back to them, ritled by her husband's side, dazzling with gold and gems, beautiful, smiling, and gracious as an angel.

In thanksgiving for God's great mercies she built the church and convent of Kempfen.

A saying of hers has outlasted its solid walls: "How wondrous are the hidden ways of the All-seeing. The Lord forgot not his handmaid. He first gave me life and honor, and then, in spite of wicked men, restored my fair fame and preserved my love. Blessed be his name forever!"

THE BEAUTIFUL GATE.

It is a fair tradition, one of old
That, at the Gate of Heaven called Beautiful,
The souls of those to whom we minister
On Earth shall greet us as we enter in
With gentle welcome, and with answer lowly deeds
Of Christian charity wherewith frail man
Proffers his humble loan unto his Lord.

May we not so believe, since He hath said
"Thou, inasmuch as thou hast done to one
Of those His little ones, 'twas done to Him?

Oh, think, if this be true, how many eyes
Whose weeping thou hast stilled shall glisten there,
How many hands whose broken bonds thou hast shared,
And heavy feet whose steps were turned by thee
Back to their homes, clastic through the joy
Of new-found hope and trust in Heavenly love,
Shall welcome thee within the Gates of Bliss,
The Golden City of Jerusalem!

MR. AND MRS. POPKINS.

I'd ever a man married a wife in a hurry John Popkins did. He came getting his hair cut, and she without a new dress for the occasion. They had many love-passages before the matter came to the notice of Miss Hildebrand's aunts. Bitterly opposed were they to the suggested alliance. Their regard for the suitor could readily be perceived by the contemptuous emphasis they placed upon the first syllable of his unscientific name.

"Popkins, indeed! Fine hair he'll have, to" A kind of midsummer madness possessed the girl, from which she would be sure to wake. But the uncles expended the whole force of their displeasure, not from an artistic but from a business point of view. Mollie's persistent fancy might have worn away in consideration for a handsome fortune. John and his brother Sam received a fine offer to go to China, there to grow yellow and rich; an opportunity seized by the latter with delight, but half accepted by John, who confessed his reason for hesitation, and the suddenness of waiting for a wife not to be gained with or without his Hildebrand investment.

"Show me the woman worth the sacrifice of your mercantile prospects," said the elder Popkins, sententiously. "There are plenty of them, and I'll tell you when you and I make our fortunes, we shall find as many willing-to-be wives as the vizier sees in the slave market."

Sam did not believe in this unknown love of John. When Mollie came to her lover's probable destiny she vexed and cried herself ill. Then the stout uncles yielded, and wrung submission from the hearts, all unwilling as it was, from the chief of the firm to Mr. Popkins, Junior. John was sitting at a high desk in his father's office, his long ungainly limbs doubled in grasshopper-wise, when this proposal of marriage came. The expression of interest and bubbling of strange humor in the full-blown surprise as he gathered the meaning of the terse sentences. Mollie! A fortune! A partnership! The young man could not realize a single sense, then perceiving Dobbs's twinkling eyes fixed knowingly upon him, and Hobbs regarding him with curiosity, he turned round, closed and replunged into his books, smiling over them in such an inane way that the paternal Popkins raised his spectacles wondering what Jones could be to smile at in long columns of figures. What indeed! As soon as he was free John rushes home, turns wildly about his chambers, starts, flies, and sits a blazing crimson into a carpet-bag, packs all with his foot, puts his hands in his pockets, and stands beside the door of his mother's sitting-room. "Going to Philadelphia. Will write." Flies down the steps and through the street, the uncles and Sam blowing out jubilant behind. Sam coming home and pondering on the oracular words of his brother's farewell, suspects much of a sudden. He resolves that John shall not be made a fool of if he can prevent it, and his presence and words are usually potent. So he packs a bag, tells his mother's manner and journey town on mischief bent. The first news received from John by the amazed Popkinses was contained in the following telegram:

"Wife and I leave for New York to-day. Be in Hartford about the 15th. Tell Sam."

But Sam was a hundred miles away and off the scent.

When the Popkins pair reached the great city Mollie was ill with a headache, an affliction which usually untitled her for the active duties of life for two or three days. Her husband, she had a fever for shopping not to be appeased.

"Now, John," says she, "here I am nice and comfortable at Brother Robert's. Do you go on to Hartford, break off your China negotiation, procure your mother to see me, and settle your affairs with your brother; for if he is to leave on the Ascension every hour is golden to you. Rodney will put me on the Hartford cars, and I shall find you waiting for me at the dock. Don't hesitate, you foolish fellow; I know how important it is that you should be at home at once; and if you will not go without me, why I shall be compelled to set off today with you."

That plan was, of course, not to be thought of, so the obedient bridegroom departs to find on reaching Hartford that Sam was in New York.

Thursday came and the little bride left the city on the Sprout Eagle, with her great trunks previously marked by the careful John "Mrs. Popkins." The first day passed serenely enough. There was a handsome gentleman sitting near her who evidently admired her. Mollie seemed to be reading Harper, but was conscious of every silent look. She dozes a little, stares at the scenery, watches the bottle-green glassy surfaces of the river cut into smooth furrows by the boat. Then she nibbles at her luncheon and becomes much annoyed by the man, when the handsome gentleman offers to arrange the awning, and does so in a manner to screen her completely. Mollie rewards him for the courtesy by a low bow and a smile, displaying all her splendid teeth.

"How much he looks like John," thought she, "except in complexion and expression, and then the features are quite unlike, and poor John's hair is red!"

After this acute observation she goes to her stateroom to sleep, and is wakened at last by the stillness around her. Not a sound is there but the low droning of some insect in the heat. Then a dull groan from the engine. She tries on her hat and hastens on deck. Is informed by the polite stranger that the Sprout Eagle is stuck fast in the mud, with no prospect of getting off until night.

"But I must be in Hartford before night," declares Mollie, as if that determined little sentence would release the boat from distance into indeed.

"Then you will have to follow the example of the other passengers, land here and take the cars."

"What shall I do?" asks Mollie, looking with some unpromising barn-like buildings, savoring neither of pleasure nor business, and a dirty, uneven causeway winding round them.

"Middletown. But there is no train before three o'clock, I believe."

"I don't care," cried Mollie, radiant with a new idea: "there is a train down, I suppose; I'll telegraph."

"And wait in Middletown for your friends? A very good notion."

So Mrs. Popkins landed, and was escorted to the hotel by the stranger, who politely offered to send her telegram. But Mollie declines; she is sure she can manage it herself, and indites a note certain to be effectual. "Darling John, do come," etc.

That much-enduring man had been pacing the dock many hours in the broiling sun, and when, on the distant bend of the river, continually excited and depressed by slops and other small craft, which came into view every five minutes, he was made to be when the news of the Sprout Eagle reached him, and strides across the city to take the cars to Berlin in order to meet the Middletown train, which bore the Sprout Eagle's passengers as he was informed. By this course, losing the telegram, which guessed him to be gone toward Hartford, again to the disgust of the office-boy who had it to deliver, and who brought it back to him in the afternoon, with the news that Mr. Popkins was not in town. So, he was staring at every woman who set foot on the Berlin platform, with her bundles and box. But the Sprout Eagle got off in the course of an hour or so, and is now on her way to Hartford. Fortunately, in John's opinion, the Northern train passes but few moments; he will yet be in time. So he is—to see his wife's enormous trunks delivered at the door by the Expressman engaged in the morning to seize and bear away all luggages labeled Popkins, and who has triumphantly done the same. Then his brother Sam receives the luggage into his hands. His eyes and brain collect its meaning. He perceives that a few moments only are left to him to catch the last train. Jumps into the Expressman's cart and is driven like mad to the station.

Mrs. Popkins having awaited the arrival of the Hartford train and the appearance of her lord, is sure "something dreadful" has happened to him when time passes by and Popkins does not come. There is not even a message for her at the telegraph office, whither she wends a second time. She rushes by vehicle proceeding to Hartford, not finding her own fortune. Is very much surprised at seeing at the railroad depôt the same mustached unknown. He is looking forward to other services with the loftiest air of distant respect. The truth was, Mollie had no idea that the stranger had possessed such a sweet baby face, that it seemed the duty of some man to take care of her, and this one was the nearest at hand. Besides, he was the wish to see her safely to the end of her journey. It naturally happened that he helped her out of the cars on reaching Hartford, and opened her a carriage.

"Add to your kindness," begged Mollie, "and direct me to a good hotel, for I am a perfect stranger here."

About the time she was driving through Hartford streets the wretched John was being informed at the hotels of the arrival of the distinguished Mr. and Mrs. Popkins for Hartford. He has passed her on the road? Driven reckless, he turned out the most desperate side of his character. Bought a pint of pea-nuts in a dismal newspaper store, where he also observed a few ancient pies perspiring in the windows, accompanied by large yellow cubes of spouse cake. Stuffing the pea-nuts into his pockets, he walked down the broad Main Street, and by and by began to eat his purchase, and throw down the husks thereof. It was now dusk. He counted nineteen young women passing by, and stopped counting. Saw two men shutting up a store. Afterward observed a crowd of seven in front of the Post-office. In these exciting scenes he wears away the time until the hour for leaving approaches. Performs a slow march to the station, where the hustle of departure is represented by a cart and horse backed to the side door of the building, and small ragamuffins petting pies upon the track to be flattened into swords. The silence appalls John. A tall, lank man, arrayed in shirt and pantaloons, is unlocking the door of a small hole. Is breathlessly questioned by the traveler.

"Train leave? Eight minutes," responds shirt-sleeves, pointedly, and buries himself in the hole. And now the ticket-window is thrown up with a loud squeak, a few people appear, an engine leisurely enters the depot and attaches itself to a car. Some one gives the wheels a ringing bang, somebody else remarks "all aboard," and the stirring city of Middletown is left behind. All wearied out, John re-enters his home, and perceives Sam sitting at a well-spread table, eating what he calls a heavy tea, and relating his adventures to his admiring family.

"Hollos, John!" cries he, "where to next, my boy?"

"Hasn't Mollie come yet?" gasps his brother.

"Lost your Mollie? Capital joke," says this unfeeling man, taking a great swallow of coffee.

"She is somewhere in Hartford," returns John, grimly. "I'll go to every house in town—"

"Wait a bit. Sit down and eat some supper," returns Sam, composedly. "Then I'll help you. Be calm. We must learn to regard these matters philosophically."

"Philosophically!" began John, angrily, but swallowed the rest of the sentence with a bite of hot buttered muffin. Then he discovered how hungry he was; for since breakfast he had eaten nothing but the pea-nuts.

"I came up in the Spread Eagle myself," said Sam, "but didn't see Mrs. Popkins, not expecting the pleasure you know. Besides, I was occupied with a forlorn little miss going to boarding-school, or something of the sort. By George, what a smile she had! and such a jolly little hand. She was in a terrible state of mind. Expected somebody to meet her who didn't. I made myself as useful as possible, but didn't dare too much. I'll see her again though. But what is the use?" and he ended with a sigh, thinking of China.

A little after 9 o'clock there came a rap at the door of No. 46 —— House, rousing Mollie from a distressed doze, and after it John Popkins victorious.

"My brother is waiting for us," says John; "he is very impatient to see you (?). Come, Mollie."

Then Sam sees John proudly approaching with a little creature clinging to his arm.

"This is my brother Sam," introducing Mollie's polite acquaintance of the morning. "And this," with ill-concealed satisfaction, "is Mrs. Popkins."

On which the elder brother for the first time in his life lost countenance, blundered in his greeting, but finally recovered himself with a desperate attempt at festive welcome—"Long live Mr. and Mrs. Popkins!"

MAJOR THOMAS JEFFERSON RODMAN.

MAJOR RODMAN AND HIS GUN.

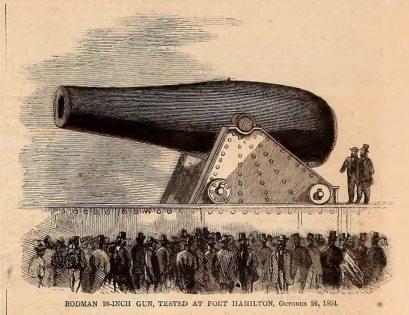
WE publish on this page a portrait of Major THOMAS J. RODMAN, together with a view of the celebrated 20-inch Rodman Gun of which he was the inventor.

Major THOMAS JEFFERSON RODMAN was born in Indiana about the year 1818, entered West Point in 1837, graduated in the Ordnance in 1841, and has ever since been one of the most useful and active officers in the corps. He obtained his Captaincy in July, 1855. He is famous for having invented a process of casting guns of enormous size hollow, and cooling them from the inside by passing a stream of water through the bore. They are known by the name of Rodman Guns. Major RODMAN is one of the greatest artillerists in the country, and is doing most excellent service at present.

On the 26th of October a trial was made at Fort Hamilton of the gigantic 20-inch which Major RODMAN has given to the world. This is the largest piece of ordnance in existence, and carries a shot weighing half a ton. The trial was witnessed by a large number of persons, among whom were Major RODMAN himself, the heads of the War and Navy Ordnance Departments, and General W. F. ("BALDY") SMITH. It indicates the size of the gun that it was possible for a man to creep into it to remove some obstructions in the vent that prevented the firing of the cannon by means of a fuse. The body of the man did not fill up the gun, and he easily made his way to the charge-chamber, which was three times his own length from the muzzle. The trial was only made to ascertain whether the cannon would carry a shot proportioned to its calibre; its range will be tested at some future day.

This gun was cast at the Fort Pitt Foundry, Pittsburg, taking 160,000 pounds of metal, and weighing when completed 116,000 pounds. The peculiarity of the gun is in the process by which it is cooled, as above described. The portion of the gun nearer the bore is solidified first, thus giving room for a gradual contraction of the outer portion. The carriage for the gun weighs 26,000 pounds, and was made at the Watertown Arsenal, near Boston, of which Major RODMAN is Superintendent. It has two parts. The lower part is called the chassis, and constitutes the railway on which the upper part of the carriage, which is like that of a mortar, slides along when it receives the recoil of the gun. The whole rests upon a granite foundation; and the forward end of the chassis is fastened to an anchor-block or pier, by means of a six-inch bolt, called a pintle. From this point the carriage revolves around a semicircular traverse rail, on wheels. This rail, and also a support for the middle of the carriage, stand on granite. It is thought that the range of this gun will be five or six miles. Even the powder used for it is peculiar, the grains being said to resemble Breckinridge coal of the chestnut size.

This gun is not mounted in the fort, but in the tier of 15-inch guns which extends along the embankment for a quarter of a mile below the fort, commanding the lower bay, and forming part of the defenses of New York harbor.



RODMAN 20-INCH GUN, TESTED AT FORT HAMILTON, OCTOBER 26, 1864.

THE DEFENSE OF ALLATOONA.

WE illustrate on this page the attack made by General HOOD on Allatoona, October 5, 1864.

After General HOOD crossed the Chattahoochee a force of five brigades and eight guns, under General FRENCH, attacked Big Shanty, on the Chattanooga Railroad, and succeeded in taking the place. They then moved on Ackworth, further north, which occupied them until evening. The next morning, October 5, they drove in the Federal pickets at Allatoona. This post was defended by Brigadier-General JOHN M. CORSE, who had abandoned Rome in order to prevent Allatoona, which was of far greater value, from falling into the hands of the enemy. General CORSE commanded a garrison of 1700 men. General FRENCH, the rebel commander, sent to CORSE a summons to surrender, "to avoid the useless effusion of blood." CORSE replied that he and his command were ready for the "useless effusion" as soon as was agreeable to General FRENCH. Leaving their artillery on the south side to shell the position, the rebels swung their infantry round to the north front, which was more practicable. The attack was violent and determined, and lasted until the middle of the afternoon, when the enemy withdrew, leaving 1300 killed and wounded on the field. Nearly 700 of CORSE'S men were killed or wounded.

The rebels numbered about 7500 in all. They came provided with a wagon train to remove the rations which SHERMAN had accumulated at Allatoona, but they went away with empty wagons. The dead rebels had their haversacks full of uncooked black beans, sugar cane, etc. General CORSE was wounded in the head, but not seriously. Only four guns were mounted in the fort. If the rebels had succeeded in taking the place, they would have been able, with the rations on hand, to have held it for several weeks.

General SHERMAN witnessed the action from Kenesaw Mountain. Two days afterward he issued a congratulatory order, commending General Corse for his gallant defense, which he considered an example illustrating both the necessity and possibility of defending fortified positions to the last.

OVER THE HILL-SIDE.

FAREWELL! In dimmer distance
I watch your figure glide
Across the sunny moorland
And brown hill-side.

Each momently uprising,
Large, dark, against the sky;
Then, in the vacant moorland,
Alone sit I.

Along the unknown country,
Where your lost footsteps pass,
What beauty decks the heavens
And calms the grass!

Over the mountain shoulder,
What glories may unfold!
Though I see but the mountain,
Blank, bare, and cold;

And the white road, slow winding
To where, each after each,
You slipped away—ah, whither?
I can not reach.

And if I call, what answers?
Only, 'twixt earth and sky,
Like wail of parting spirit,
The curlew's cry.

* * * * *

Yet sunny is the moorland,
And soft the plessant air;
And little flowers, like blessings,
Grow every where.

While over all the mountain
Stands, sombre, calm, and still;
Immutable and steadfast
As the One Will;

Which, done on earth, in heaven,
Eternally confessed
By men, and saints, and angels,
Be ever blest!

Under Its infinite shadow,
Safer than light of sun,
I'll sit me down a little
And gather flowers.

Then I will rise and follow,
Without one wish to stay,
The path ye all have taken—
The appointed way.

THE CASE OF MONS. D'EGVILLE.

THIS remarkable case of circumstantial evidence, though generally known to the curious in such matters who have searched into West Indian records, is as yet, we believe, entirely new to the American public. The details, however, might never have been laid before them had not the original papers been recently discovered in the Provost-marshal's office in Hamilton and copied and forwarded to the writer. Besides the intrinsic interest attaching to the story told in a mere anecdote, there is the object of adding another instance to the list of exceptions carried out upon the evidence of circumstance alone, and of showing how some of the most subtle as the weak points which characterize this peculiar form of judgment. Perhaps a close and careful comparison of numerous instances of circumstantial evidence might assist in moulding into something like a system the various and sometimes almost contradictory inferences deduced during trials of this character, and in bringing them under a legal form which might be applied when similar occasions required. At present it is well known that the law of circumstantial evidence is very uncertain, and this story before us is a most conspicuous instance.

In the year 1834, Michael Harvey Peter William Henry D'Egville, resident in the island of Barbadoes, West Indies, dancing-master, was brought up before the local Jane Sessions charged with having caused the death of his wife by administering to her poison in the form of arsenic.

The name of D'Egville has been always famous as the title of a family of dancing-masters and professors: there were some of the family, I believe, in Cheltenham when I was a boy, and I certainly was instructed in the art by a D'Egville, though whether the name was assumed as a recommendation or not I can not say. The unfortunate man whom I write had, though a Frenchman, migrated to Barbadoes with the view of teaching dancing, and was, it is reported, very successful. From some what long residence in the island, he married a lady whom family usage was Llewellyn, though whether maid or widow at the time of her union with D'Egville is not shown. The Frenchman was not a man of good character: he was addicted to debauched society and to drink. In many of his tipsy fits he was wont to strike and ill-use his wife, though he never seemed to cherish the least ill-feeling toward her. He was not therefore malicious, though he was quarrelsome in his cups. Still, his ill-usage of Mrs. D'Egville was so continuous and excessive that the long-suffering wife determined upon a separation. This was effected without any scene of violence or recrimination between the parties; and while the dissolute husband pursued at uncertain intervals his profession of dancing-master, the relieved wife lived at some distance, out of his and harm's way as was supposed. It is to be particularly noticed that, though separated from each other, no ill-feeling was to be discerned between Mr. and Mrs. D'Egville; on the contrary, the wife was in the habit of sending to her depraved partner little attentions in the form of dainties, such as she knew he was attached to, as for instance, fruit, soup, rare fish, etc., etc. D'Egville recognized these attentions, and (occasionally) returned them, though the flctuation of his gains at times prohibited an equivalent interchange of gifts. Now D'Egville was aware that his wife had not only signified her intention of leaving to him a sum of money at her death, but had actually executed the testament by which she was to be entitled at her demise to a bequest of £600 old Barbadoes currency, i. e., about £330 sterling.

It was proved that D'Egville had bought arsenic some few days previously at a druggist's shop, and being asked if it was required for rats, said, "Yes; and I shouldn't care much if they were two-legged ones?" Observe, that to be in the possession of arsenic was nothing of itself, for there generally was a supply in every house in the island for the extermination of rats; but, indeed, I can vouch for the fact of my grandfather keeping a very large quantity in the medicine chest for periodical poisonings of wood-ants which infect one of the mills on his estates, so that no stress can be laid on the mere purchase of the arsenic.

Mrs. D'Egville was particularly fond of toasted cheese, and at times of the year cheese was a very scarce article in the island. However, things had been progressed with the Stilton at the time of the purchased a piece, had it prepared, and sent it to his wife by the hands of a little mulatto boy, with these instructions: "Tell her to eat it herself, and not to give any of it to Miss Llewellyn." This was Mrs. D'Egville's sister, who lived in the same house with her.

Mrs. D'Egville was found dead in her bed next morning—Miss Llewellyn was confined upon the two or three of the negro servants were ill, though they ultimately recovered.

An inquest was immediately held, and, Dr. Cutting tested the contents of the stomachs of the deceased, the rejected matter from the negroes who were suffering at the time, and the remainder of the cheese which was left in the dish. In all was arsenic found.

D'Egville was arrested, and brought up at the June Sessions in 1834. It was the interim between the death of the late Attorney-General and Solicitor, and the appointment of his successor, and Mr. Coulthard (acting attorney-general) prosecuted. Mr. Hinds defended the prisoner, resting his defense on the fact that a link in the chain of evidence was wanting. This meant of course the evidence of the little mulatto boy who had carried the cheese to Mrs. D'Egville, for negro evidence could not be received in court at that time.

The jury, after long consultation, came into court and said that it was impossible that they could ever agree, nine of their number being for an acquittal and three for a verdict of "Guilty" so they were discharged, and the prisoner remanded to the next sessions. At sessions, Samuel Hinds was appointed Attorney-General. When the sessions opened (December, 1834), Mr. Hinds declined to prosecute, on the ground of having formed friendly relations with prisoner, so the prosecution devolved upon Mr. Solicitor-General Griffith. The jury were empannelled, the indictment was read, and pleaded to, and the case and the last sessions were read over to them, and after a short deliberation they brought in a verdict of "Guilty."

Extract from the minute-book of the Court of Grand Sessions held December 17, 1834:

Michael Harvey Peter William Henry D'Egville was this day duly arraigned upon the charge of murder upon which he had any thing to say why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon him, delivered in a paper writing, signed by himself and Mr. Hinds, his counsel, which paper was read by the clerk of the crown, and that he, the said D'Egville, was put on his trial at a former session of this court, to which time sentence upon that judgment might be arrested and stayed against him, that a commission of lunacy was directed to the same, on the ground that the former trial was not complete, inasmuch as the jury had not been rendered, and also that he had not been put on the present trial pleaded "not guilty," and put himself upon God and his country, and that plea having been accepted. The opinion of the court being taken, the said paper writing was ordered to be entered upon record.

Sentence of death was then passed upon the prisoner, which the prisoner received without any observation, and was thereupon remanded to the custody of the provost-marshal.

Here is a copy of his death warrant:

GEORGE THE FOURTH, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, etc.

To our Provost-Marshal of our said Island of Barbadoes, or his lawful deputy, greeting:

WHEREAS Michael Harvey Peter William Henry D'Egville, late of the parish of St. Michael, in the island aforesaid, yeoman, now detained in our custody in our jail of parochial length, was, at a Court of Grand Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, General Jail Delivery, and General Sessions of the Peace, held in the city of our said island, and begun on Tuesday, the fourteenth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four, and so continued and held by special adjournment de die in diem, on the fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth days of the said month, at the Town Hall, in the parish of St. Michael, in our island aforesaid, and also by and arraigned for the murder of Susanna D'Egville, and thereupon was tried, confessed, said in due form as by law attainted, and now standing adjudged unto death, of which judgment execution remains to be done. We therefore command, and by these presents firmly enjoin you, that in and upon Monday the fourteenth day of the month of February, between the hours of nine and twelve in the forenoon of the same day, you carry the said M. H. P. W. H. D'Egville to the place of execution within the jail-yard, in the town of St. Michael, in the island aforesaid, and there cause him the said M. H. P. W. H. D'Egville to be hanged by the neck until he be dead, and that they you fail not to do upon peril thereon to ensue.

Witness,—His Excellency Sir Henry Wards, K.C.B., etc., his Majesty's Captain-General and Governor, Commander-in-Chief in and over the island, etc., at Government House, this seventh day of February, in the sixth year of our reign.

(Signed) HENRY WARDS.

This warrant was duly carried into effect.

Some years afterward, when D'Egville's name was forgotten, a negro man who had been a slave in the possession of Mrs. D'Egville, and who was, by her father's will, to receive his manumission, confessed that he had received the cheese from the mulatto boy who had died in the arsenic, as he was aware that his freedom was to follow upon his mistress's death. The link wanting (as the learned counsel observed), namely, what had passed between the time the cheese was put out of D'Egville's hands and its delivery into those of his wife, was now supplied. The negro's name was Christian, and he went, as was usual, by the family name of Llewellyn. And this he confessed upon his death-bed, to the great discomfiture of those who had condemned the wretched dancing-master, and to the shame of the verdict, resting on evidence, drawn from negro lips, in a trial where life and death depended upon evidence alone.

THE BEST MUSICAL INSTRUMENT FOR THE FAMILY.

"THE piano-forte," says the American Baptist, "extensively as it is used, is not so well adapted to all the purposes of sacred and secular music as another instrument which is now justly claiming a large share of public attention, and which has already been extensively introduced into schools, families, and churches, and received the indorsement of the chief organists, musicians, and artists of America—we mean MASON & HAMLIN'S Cabinet Organ."

MUNRO'S TEN CENT NOVELS

Are the most popular series of cheap publications ever introduced to the American public. While giving them the highest literary execution, the publishers have studiously excluded every thing that could offend the most scrupulous taste. Each of the numbers should be in every library. The following are the names: No. 1, The Hunters: 2, The Trapper's Daughter; 3, The Forest Highwayman; 4, The Hunted Chasseur; 5, The Track of Fire; 6, The Man-Eater; 7, Phantom Bullets; 8, The Death Feru; 9, The Indian Slayer; 10, The Tiger of the Ocean; 11, The Hunter's Triumph; 12, The Lost Trail; 13, The Boy Outwitted; 14, Zeta Stevens, the Lion-hearted Scout; 15, The Sponge of Death; 16, The Copper Indians; 17, The Long-Legged Boy; or, The Demon of the Woods; 18, The Wild Man of the Mountain; 19, The Tomb Ridge; 20, The Rollicking Rangers; 21, Rattlesnake Dick; or, the Outlaw's Fate; 22, Shanghai Bill; 23, Liberty Tom, the Last of the Pages of the Prairie; or, the Sinker of the Cave; 24, The Robber's Terror.

For sale by all News Agents, and sent post-paid on receipt of price, 10 cents each. GEORGE MUNRO & CO., No. 137 William Street, New York.

DYSPEPSIA AND COSTIVENESS CURED.

D. J. Tenny's Case.

New York Mercury, January 14, 1860.

Whether the Brandreth Pill be or ever converted into blood we will not now discuss. But one chief object which all time is to give a statement of a gentleman who says he has taken one of the Brandreth Pills, for at least sixteen months, daily, or as often as occasion has required, and who now at the end of that time he considered himself cured of Dyspepsia, attended by a constant costive state of the bowels, which had troubled him for a long time.

This gentleman, Mr. Daniel J. Tenny, resides at the Astor House, in this city, and has been in the enjoyment of excellent health since he was cured by the above treatment. He is an intelligent man, and there is no doubt of the truth of his statement. This proves, at least, that so many as use of the Pills proposed by Dr. Brandreth can be taken for nearly 500 days in succession without harm, and at the end of that time a dyspeptic and costive habit of long to be perfectly cured. The could not be said of any of the cathartics in use by those who style themselves the Regular Faculty.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS.—The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is time the public had an article of real, that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all seasons, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. A quart bottle will last a week per person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. It is not better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctors' bills, and so much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? It is a luxurious beverage as well as a medicine. Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing before you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the appetite, give more vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a study of the Pineapple Cider, says it cures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month, at the first trial. He continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire success in every instance in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $2 per bottle (full quart). Sent free by express on receipt of price.

Important to Subscribers.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY will take notice that the expiration of each subscription will be indicated. The figures on the direction-label following the name of each person, show when the subscription EXPIRES, as noted on our books. Every Subscriber whose time expires will be notified that we expect payment for his remittance, and also when to renew his subscription, in order that no numbers be missed. Subscribers are particularly requested to name the NUMBER with which their subscription should commence, as we find this most receiving duplicates, or missing any Number. It is desirable that a Renewal should be forwarded two weeks BEFORE the expiration of the former Subscription, in order that our books may be regularly posted. Attention to this will obviate nine-tenths of the errors which occur.—Publishers' and Subscribers' Book.

NOVEMBER 8, 1864.

We breathe more freely now the struggle's done,
That for that thou the Union yet shall live;
The grandest civil triumph which shall stand
Recorded in the annals of the land.

We trusted in the cause—we knew that Right
Must conquer Wrong, however hard the fight;
That not in vain by patriots had been shed
The precious blood with which our soil is red.

No, not in vain; to-day the pledge we give,
That for that blood the Union yet shall live;
And from the strong lips of the loyal North
In thunder tones the promise now goes forth.

Faith in that promise makes my eyes to see
Peace shining through the smoke of victory;
And as the cloud of battle drifts away
I see the white dawn of a future day.

Above the din of war I seem to hear
From tower and roof the sweet-toned bells of cheer
Ring out the welcome tidings to the skies,
While joyful peans on the air arise.

I see bold Freedom with a giant's stroke
Hurl to the earth the bondman's heavy yoke;
I see her strike from off his horny hands
The galling chains and fetters where he stands.

I see a temple; from its dome on high
A glorious banner greets the broad blue sky;
The starry emblem of a mighty land,
Whose people all are one in heart and hand.

THE SITUATION.

FOUR years have not exhausted the hands or the hearts of the people. Yet we do not suppose that any expectation of an immediate end of the rebellion had a perceptible influence upon the election. That act was hoped for and prayed for by all loyal and thoughtful men is unquestionable; but the very duration of the war has taught us the tenacity and the resources of the rebellion.

No man who is fitted by study and observation to form opinions will imagine that under any circumstances whatever the war could have been a short one. To suppose that a victory at Bull Run would have terminated the rebellion is to betray the most profound ignorance of the real condition of the country at that time. If the North had been unanimous —if it had believed that the rebellion was not a riot but a revolution—if it had had a vast trained army and navy, with their properly-shilled officers, it had determined upon war at all, and by common consent, that whatever was necessary to save the Government was constitutional, and that no hint of negotiation with armed rebels should ever be tolerated—and then, having conquered at Bull Run, had pushed forward by land and sea, and occupied and possessed the rebel section, the war might sooner have ended.

But if this had been the situation it would never have been. It was precisely because the rebel chiefs knew that the North—by which term we mean the loyal citizens—were very far from unanimous—because they knew that there was no navy and no army, and that the great naval and military officers inclined to the rebel side—because they knew that the Constitution would be constantly pleaded for the rebellion—and because they believed, as they had good reason to, that the surprised counties could be forced to terms by the scarcity of food, by party-spirit, and by fear of bankruptcy—it was because the rebel chiefs knew that we had not the conditions or the possibility of speedily ending a war that they took up the sword.

They have ever since counted upon our ravages. They have been willing to endure any extremity themselves, in the hope of seeing us exhausted. They knew that we were rich and populous; but they were willing to take brown paper for money, and to send every man into the field, so confident were they that we must presently be tired of the war, and insist upon ending it. The election undeceives them. They know now that we are not willing to admit the separate sovereignty of the States, or to allow that the Government of the United States is overthrown. They understand that the gage is thrown down for war to the end.

That the rebel leaders will be disappointed is beyond question. Governor Brown, of Georgia, evidently expected a different result. We have constantly misjudged them in many respects, but not less have they misapprehended us. Governor Brown's fear was in believing that the Chicago leaders represented the real feeling of the people. His true fear they would gladly have peace. They will more gladly have war than a truce. The rebel leaders will be disappointed, doubtless, but they will not yield. To relax their authority in the least, to seem to waver even in their design of securing absolute independence, would be to see every thing fall from them, and to be suddenly ruined.

They have staked every thing upon the chance. They will still stand sullenly at bay. While they can persuade people to give a bushel of corn for a piece of brown paper two inches square, so long they will have enough to eat. They will sit down behind their earth-works, and the sternest military despotism and the melancholy suicidal pride which supports men in the last extremity, will sustain them yet for many a month, forbidding them to speak, almost to think, against the authorities over them. Their soldiers may not be paid, but they will be fed. The rebellion will resolve itself into an inert mass of resistance which must be crumbled away.

Upon this mass the disintegrating superior force of the loyal country will be thrown, and the issue, although in the means of things sure, can not be very sudden. There is a great deal of truth in what DAVIS says. In a certain sense no particular point is essential to the rebellion. Richmond may fall with Atlanta, Charleston and Mobile with New Orleans, and still the fire creep and smoulder on. The resistance will be made where men can be massed in small or large numbers. There will be no end of the war as in a treaty of peace with a foreign foe. It will work out. It will be extinguished as a fire is upon the prairie, which is trampled out here and there, and flames up again beyond. But when it is out it is out. There are no more no sparks, no cinders, no points in which the fire hides to leap forth again to-morrow.

This process has begun. The election does not mean, indeed, the great pitched peace next month, but that we intend to continue the smothering. No man can be so blind as not to see the internal condition of the rebellion as revealed in all the last accounts. It does not indicate a "collapse," but it does show consumption. What we have to do is to wait patiently and steadily, putting out all our force all the time. The rebels have no reason for holding out that we have not in a hundred-fold greater degree, and the 8th of November teaches them that we are fully aware of it.

SHERMAN.

FREDERICK THE GREAT'S Silesian campaigns were not more remarkable than General SHERMAN'S. A more faithful and accomplished soldier has not been known in our history; and, compared with him and his operations, how poor sounds the old talk about the "Great Captain" Lee!

SHERMAN forced his way straight through the enemy's territory, over mountains and rivers, baffling all enemies, defying all foes, and by signs, driving the whole mass of the rebel army backward until he planted his flag where he set out to plant it, and set his foot upon it. The victory extorted a wail of anguish and rage from the rebel chief, for he felt the mortal wound. In utter desperation he attempted to turn upon his army upon SHERMAN'S rear and to threaten Tennessee. SHERMAN turned upon him, drove him from his intended line, detached General THOMAS with his army to hold him in the center of Alabama or to coax him across the Tennessee; while now, with all his banners flying and bugles blowing, his victorious army countermarched, SHERMAN shakes out his glittering columns and advances to the sea.

There is no considerable force to oppose him. The ample breadth of Georgia lies open to him. The finest and richest tract of the rebel region is his parade-ground, and ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS's own State is the theater of his triumph. The rebel chiefs know that, if it drew the sword, it would miserably perish by it.

Whether SHERMAN will march upon Mobile, or Savannah, or Charleston, or whether he is moving at all, is not known. But whatever be his destination, he will reach it and occupy it. There is no force and no generalship in the rebel lines which can compare with his. And the coming of his army, although it necessarily leave a path of desolation, will be the shining of a bright light in the darkness of the South. It will show rebels that the Government of the United States has interposed a force that it is useless to contend with the inflexible resolution of the American people that their Government shall be maintained.

The people of the rebel section have seen the progress of our arms in the last three years. They have not forgotten that they were themselves arrogantly successful until the Government could create and collect its forces and bring them to bear. They have seen the loyal part of the country subdued until they, too, are, as to the necessary conditions of war. They have seen an angry and malignant faction arise and threaten to paralyze and divide the loyal nation. They have seen the wise and painful process by which we have ascertained who are our real military chiefs, and they see them now in command. They have seen the opening of the Mississippi, the occupation of the Southwest, the bulling at every point of their attempted advance, the continuous pressing before the national hand, as JOHNSON shrank from SHERMAN. They have seen the hope of foreign interference expire, cotton dethroned, and their finances ruined. They have seen the defection of their army, and have heard it confirmed by DAVIS himself. And now at last they have seen the attitude of their loyal fellow-citizens perfectly unchanged, and hear them in the fourth year of the war, by a unanimity which is marvelous, declare that whatever may be the further cost of the struggle it shall go on until the authority of the mildest, freest, and best government in the world is every where and entirely restored.

The coming of SHERMAN'S army will be the visible proof of all the things they have seen. Desperate they may be, brave and furious, but they are men still, and there is a point at which all men yield. If that point is not nearly reached, very well. We can wait. They know now that SHERMAN is the representative of the loyal country, and that the war will continue until that point is reached.

THE FEELING OF THE NORTH.

THE President's two speeches in acknowledgment of the serenades after the election are the noblest expression of the universal public sentiment. There is no personal or partisan exultation. The issue was too solemn for that. There is the same sober joy as after a great victory or a narrow escape.

It has been customary for foreigners, and many among ourselves, to speak of MR. LINCOLN as the rebels speak of him, and to celebrate JEFFERSON DAVIS as a gentleman and a polished intellectual statesman. Will such persons compare the public speeches at Macon, Columbia, and elsewhere, or his earlier speeches in the war, with any speech of MR. LINCOLN, and especially these two last, and then say which of them are the manlier and more honorable? With malignant fury, which not even his trained coolness can conceal, DAVIS hisses that he would not characterize with hyenas than Yankees; or in his foolish rage speaks of the "Beast" BUTLER. Is this the style of a statesman? Is this the expression of the intellectual superiority which distinguishes JEFFERSON DAVIS? Or is it the scurrility of a baffled conspirator, and the venomous malice of a disappointed rebel?

Nothing in the history of the war is more striking than the different spirit in which it is waged by the two sections of the land. Indeed, the murderous and wicked olive-branch policy, which has so prolonged and embittered the struggle, is the very reverse of proper insight and a more wholesome indignation upon the part of loyal citizens. From the beginning it was not only war, but war made upon the Government by men who had been taught to hate "the North" and "Northerners." And while rebels have been starving and slaughtering in every battle any Union men at the South, and Union soldiers from the North, we have gone on mumbling "conciliation," until we were likely to be overthrown by our obstinate refusal to understand our enemies.

We have learned now what they are. The election plucks off the olive branches and throws them away; and the cant about conciliation is a word to be spoken to rebels when they have submitted and not before. Yet there is no personal hate mingled with this resolution. As a class the rebels are regarded by the most strenuous loyal citizens as sophisticated and deluded; as men who must be taught by superior force to regard their obligations as citizens of the United States, but that is all. In no official paper or speech of the Union authorities has there been any response to the malignity toward the insurgents, nor will there be. Engaged in defending their Government, which is the sole security of their peace and prosperity, the people of the United States yield to no unworthy emotion. They are faithfully represented by the man whom they have again made their President, "of good will, and success" not "void of personal triumph;" but they are resolved, as he says, through every fortune, "to stand by free government and the rights of humanity."

PARTY AND FACTION.

WHAT is a party, and what is a faction? It is very necessary to understand the difference between them, that every honest party-man may not find himself in the dishonest position of a factionist.

In a word, then, legitimate parties in a free country represent the different policies which different classes of the Government and people pursue. A legitimate party presents and defends the measures by which it thinks the Government can most effectually be served. If the country is at war, it brings forward its plans for its prosecution, and explains and defends them, having in view the integrity of the nation, the national honor, and the maintenance of the Government. Its attacks, if it be out of power, are directed against the method by which the war is waged, not against the war itself, especially when it is a civil war imperiling the existence of the nation. A legitimate party is of necessity patriotic by what it ceases to be patriotic it has become faction.

Faction, then, is the spirit which incessantly thwarts and opposes the operations of the Government for the purpose of overthrowing it. It considers the fall of the Government a smaller calamity than its own exclusion from political power. Consequently, when the country is engaged in war, however necessary, honorable, and just, however essential to the very existence of the nation and government, faction denounces the war under the pretense of high humanity and religion, appeals to every base emotion, every mean and unworthy passion, seeking to paralyze the hand and chill the heart of the Government and the people.

Thus, in the last session of Congress, when certain representatives voted steadily against every measure proposed by the Government for prosecuting the war, without offering any substitute, they voted to deliver the country naked into the hands of its enemies. When some of their associates said to them, "Here we are, sworn to maintain the Government, and if our party has any measures to propose for that purpose we are ready to support them," the only answer they received was: "We are going to propose nothing. We are going to let the Administration go to the dogs in its own way." This was the reply of the most malignant faction. It was exactly the spirit of BENEDICT ARNOLD. It was the very reverse of a legitimate party opposition, for it was a blow at the life of the Government, under which alone legitimate parties exist.

At the next session the true Opposition has but one course to pursue, unless it acknowledges a purely factious character. Its only honorable course, as a party, is to propose wiser measures for the surer and speedier victory of the nation over the rebellion than the Administration proposes. Merely to block the wheels and to cast impediments in the path, merely to snarl, and growl, and hiss, is the course of cowards and knaves. Should CHARLES JAMES FOX tell the Parliamentary opposition to WILLIAM PITT, it was not when England was struggling with a foreign or domestic enemy, but when FOX and PITT differed as to the means by which war was to be avoided and the authority of the British Government maintained intact. That was a legitimate opposition. But to oppose whatever the Administration proposes during the war, merely because it proposes it, is to make the welfare of the country a football, and to deserve the contempt of all true men.

Let the Opposition learn by last winter's experience, and by the prodigious emphasis of the election, that when the Government is fairly and rightly assailed, the only honorable party question is how most surely to save it.

GOLDWIN SMITH.

THE breakfast given by members of the Union League Club to Professor GOLDWIN SMITH was a tribute worthy of the city and of the guest. Among the names of our foreign friends, friends who have constantly and with masterly power and eloquence defended our cause, none is fairer than that of GOLDWIN SMITH. Professor of History at Oxford, and a close and wise student of the history of the world around him, he comprehends the exact significance of this great war of ours, and speaks to his countrymen with a historical knowledge of the relation of England as a belligerent power which is most dangerous to provoke, and overwhelming when it is matched against English inconsistency.

Before he wrote or spoke or addressed PRINCE JOHN SMITH was known to intelligent observers not only by the lectures from his University chair and his comprehensive, luminous, and noble little work upon Ireland, but from his sagacious practical service as a leader of the liberal workmen who aspire the liberal reform of England. He was before CORDEN in boarding the London Times. Early in 1863 he wrote: "The leading journal has indeed waged war against 'thinkers' for a quarter of a century with questionable success." And with a fine exultation, which recalls the better days and men of this country, adds: "I am the most willing to be called a 'thinker,' or, if possible, worse names, if I can contribute in the slightest degree towards giving however small a section of the public to exercise forecast in politics; to study our position in the community of nations, to change with the necessities of the always ways of Providence, and subdue ambition to them; and to lay, by deliberate action on intelligible principles, the solid foundations of happiness and greatness."

The opinion of foreigners upon our affairs is often compared to that of posterity; and certainly only the views of a man like GOLDWIN SMITH have the kind of equity that we attribute to those who come after us, and who are removed from the ruins of a country against which we live. How fully this is recognized, and how gladly our great debt to him is acknowledged, Professor SMITH'S reception in this country must have proved to him and to his countrymen. In our vindication, CORDEN, BRIGHT, CAIRNES, NEWMAN, and the rest.

It was fortunate that AUGUSTE LANGEL, who, with GASPARIN, LABOULAYE, HENRI MARTIN, and other noble Frenchmen, have not less commendended themselves to us, was also present at the breakfast. M. LANGEL, in response to an honorary sentiment, spoke with a fluency and facility which would have been charming in an American, but in a Frenchman expressing himself in a foreign tongue was extraordinary. And when Professor BOTTA, with his historic Italian-American name and traditions, spoke in the same English tongue and with the same generous sympathy, it was impossible not to feel that the generous heart of every truly civilized as-tion beats harmonious; and that the best men in each aim to make that general justice practicable which can alone secure the peace of the world.

THE BOSTON SAILORS' FAIR.

On the morning of election-day Captain WENDELL, of the Kearsarge, came ashore at Boston, and, going at once to his lodgings, he immediately voted for the cause for which he had fought. On the next day the great Fair for the Sailors was opened in Boston by the customary speeches: but with a variety of material and a cordiality of purpose which show how true the national heart is to the brave men at sea who defend his personal honor and the flag.

It was a happy event for the opening of the Fair that Captain WINSLOW, the hero of victory, is perhaps the most interesting single naval incident of the war, should be present. Yet the sinking of the Alabama was only one incident. The history of the navy in this war is fully worthy its earlier exploits. The fight at Hatteras; the opening of New Orleans; the defeat of the Merrimac; the capture of Hilton Head; the occupation of Double Bay; the sinking of the Alabama; the explosion of the Albemarle; the capture of the Florida, with the inflexible Semmes safe under parole at large in the midst of a continent, and the hundred illustrious episodes of individual daring and victory, are all naval triumphs upon which the shades of LAWRENCE and DECATUR, of ESEX ROBBINS and OLIVER PERRY may approvingly smile. When the war began there were some fine ships in the navy, but ISAAC TOUCEY, the Secretary of the Navy, knowing that the Government was to be attacked, had put all but four of them out of the way. Less than eight thousand men sufficed for the service of these ships. Now the vessels have increased to nearly six hundred, and fifty thousand seamen care for them. Meanwhile FARRAGUT and DU PONT, and WORDEN and PORTER and WINSLOW, have written their names bright and clear in our history.

The profit of the Boston Sailors' Fair is to found a home for seamen, such as the United States has not yet provided. For by some remarkable oversight nineteen years every man must elapse before one of the men, for instance, who fought upon the Kearsarge can become the permanent guest of a United States marine hospital. To secure that berth a sailor must have been in the service for twenty years. This is making what the French would call a loud articulation.

The Fair has opened with such spirit that there can be no doubt of realizing a large sum for its generous purpose. Every body will be glad to cheer the honest heart of the sailor-boy, and to assure him, wherever, in strange and remote seas, he fights for the flag that those whom the flag protects hail his work and honor his bravery.

MR. STEPHEN MASSETT is lecturing in Baltimore, where his "Drifting About" has proved very successful.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MILITARY SITUATION.

The interest in the military record of the past week is chiefly gossipy and conjectural, especially about Sherman's proposed campaign. In Virginia no important event has occurred, except the withdrawal of Sheridan's army to the vicinity of Winchester. He was followed by the rebel cavalry under LEE, engaged Merritt and Custer. The latter retired, but did not succeed in drawing the enemy entirely after him. Intimidating rumors were abroad, Sheridan trying in vain to bring on a general engagement. Early's rebels advanced with their cavalry, and drove the rebels through and beyond Front Royal, capturing a number of prisoners, and considerable stores. There is nothing new from the Army of the James, except that there is a change the west limit of the line, from the Hewlett House, near Dutch Gap, to Drury's Bluff with a short and valuable breastwork. It is evident by the operation of the rebels that on the completion of the Dutch Gap Canal the movement will be attended by combined assault of our land and naval force. The Richmond papers of Monday (21st) were quite confident that Lee will be reinforced by the best part of Sheridan's army. Early's army is reported at number from 30,000 to forty thousand men. The rebels have on the James River three iron-clad rams, and on the pike of the Appomattox four wooden gun-boats.

On the night of November 5 about 600 of A. P. Hill's men made another rally to capture the pickets of Mott's Division, on the Hatcher's Run road, in which they were beaten by our main line.

Commander Macomb's official report of the capture of Plymouth by our naval force gives as the results of the victory the capture of seventy-five cannon, one steamer, large quantities of ammunition, and a few prisoners. The Albemarle was found completely demolished. The following vessels took part in the expedition against Plymouth: the Miami, Southfield, Commodore Hull, Sassacus, Whitehead, Tacony, and Valley City.

GENERAL SHERMAN.

General Hood's movements for some time past have indicated an intention on his part of taking up finally a position on the Tennessee River. On the 22d of October he was at Brookville, in Northern Alabama. At this point his army numbered about 40,000 men, and was moving down the Tennessee River with the design of crossing at three different points—Decatur, Whitehaven, and Florence—for landing. From this time his movements are not certainly known; but it seems probable that Sherman's advance from the country probably led him to scatter his forces pretty widely between Atlanta and Chattanooga, in order to be well more northerly than Chattanooga. On October 26 the Charleston Mercury of October 31 volunteers the opinion that Hood had better skip Sherman first and march northward, with a view to cut off his supplies through a weak or two, ending in retreat or disaster, would do much more than push good-will and the lukewarm, and confirm the desponding and timid."

In the same time General Sherman, from Resaca north of the Tennessee with a force sufficient to confront Hood, has moved with his main army in another direction. October 22 he was at Gaylesville, Alabama, having up to that time kept well in Hood's rear. From that point he moved to Rome, and had reached Atlanta and joined Slocum's Corps at that place during the first week of November. Here the election took place on the 8th. Wednesday morning the rebels made three attacks on Atlanta, but were repulsed, retreating further northward. To this date we have no information, and the most various conjectures are made as to the movement upon which he probably set out on the 10th or 11th. General Gillem had just routed a force of Confederate cavalry, driving him into Virginia, and this has led to the supposition that Sherman's move will be directly for the Virginia and East Tennessee Railroad. All of the Gulf States are open to him, and it is probable that he may take his course southward to the coast, taking Andersonville in his way. This inference is drawn from the fact that he has written to the Western Sanitary Commission, in which he says, under date of October 31, "Address me at Atlanta." Look out for the prompt fulfillment of the request to send certain articles for our prisoners at Andersonville. The scene is changed since, and I may go in person to deliver these articles to the prisoners at Andersonville." Again, that he would move on Savannah or Charleston. The rebel papers, it is to be noted, have been very anxious about the office as we are at the North. Atlanta is still held by the Twentieth Corps.

General A. J. Smith's Division from Memphis is at Eastport. Forrest has crossed from the Tennessee River in the western part of the State; but he failed in taking Johnsonville, which was his chief object, the iron being always navigable to this point. On the 8th Wheeler and Forrest withdrew from Johnsonville, the latter in front of a Federal naval and land force to this point.

Governor Brownlow has issued a call on Texas cattle over the Mississippi River for the benefit of Eastern Tennessee. It is thought that Texas will be even more ready to co-operate with Hood on the west side of the Mississippi.

FROM THE SOUTHWEST.

On the 15th of September Admiral Porter presented a sword to Brigadier-General Joseph Bailey, who did him such service in constructing the dam which set free a portion of the fleet from their perilous position above the falls at Alexandria during the Red River Expedition.

The rebels have three gun-boats on the Red River, two of them finished of which is the Webb, mounting six heavy guns, and thickly armored. These are supposed to be lying at Shreveport. The fate of the other three boats are daily expected to declared.

November 4 Galveston was severely wounded by a guerrilla while ascending the White River on the gun-boat Cricket. It is thought that he will recover.

EXPLOSION OF THE "CULP."

On the 17th inst. the gunboat Culp exploded in the Potomac River, off St. Mary's in the afternoon for the Washington Navy-yard. Between thirty and forty persons were killed, and a number her boilers exploded, sending the upper portion of the vessel high into the air, and scattering the fragments, including them about in every direction. She had on board 69 persons, officers and men, of whom nine were saved. Nine officers, and some of those nine were mortally injured.

THE RESIGNATION OF GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

The following order was issued by the President November 14:

1. That the resignation of George B. M'Clellan as Major-General in the United States Army be accepted, to take effect from the Adjutant-General on the 15th inst., to be accepted as of the 25th of October.

2. That the said George B. M'Clellan's military skill, and just confidence in the courage and patriotism of his troops, be evinced by the fact that on the battle-field on the 19th of October at Cedar Run, whereby, under the blessing of Almighty God, the rebel army was vanquished, a great national disaster was retrieved, and a brilliant victory achieved, which was followed up by one of the greatest battle within thirty days, Philip H. Sheridan is appointed Major-General in the United States Army, to rank as such from the 8th day of November, 1864.

SOUTHERN NEWS.

On the 7th of November the rebel Congress assembled at Richmond. The Senate was unusually numerous. In this session we recognize the familiar names of Hunter, Brockenbrough, Johnson, Orr, Semmes, Wigfall, etc. Of the members of the House, only 62 were present at the opening of the session, nearly half of the whole representation of the borough. The Richmond hotels embraced the opportunity to raise the prices of board to $40 per day.

DAVIS' Message is of especial interest on account of the important questions upon which he touches. He devotes the first portion of the document to a review of the military campaign of June. He says that the defeat of Hood's army in Sherman's advance into Georgia or in Grant's next campaign in Richmond. The war, he says, is not of his claims, would still leave the contest undecided. He does not once allude to the Confederate victories in the Valley, but points with an indignant gesture to Sheridan's barbarities in the same region. He then refers, in a paragraph to a consideration of the Confederate finances. The total expenditure for the year 1864 is set down at $1,147,276,503, of which about half was funded. He is opposed to the issue of Treasury notes, and says that the last was nearly $100,000,000. In these statements the value of gold is taken at $20 per dollar, or $2,000 in gold, or about $50,000,000 in Confederate currency, and the expenditure for the month of October was over $100,000

BEFORE PETERSBURG—FORTIFICATIONS ON THE WELDON RAILROAD.—[SKETCHED BY J. W. PATTISON.]

BEFORE PETERSBURG.

We print on this and the next page illustrations of General GRANT'S campaign against Richmond. These comprise a view on the Weldon Railroad, showing the present condition of that road, and sketches of fortifications on and to the left of the railroad; of reinforcements on their way to the front, and of a peculiar mode of punishing refractory soldiers who refuse duty because, having enlisted for the cavalry, they have been put in the infantry instead. The officer in command accosts one of these disappointed soldiers thus:

"Then you want to ride a horse, do you?"

"Yes Sir."

"Corporal, fix him a horse."

The horse is brought, and turns out to be a wooden one with a not very generous allowance of back. Upon this the soldier is mounted, and a wooden saber is placed in his hand. Punishment for disobedience of orders is always just: still we can only regard it as natural that a soldier enlisting as a cavalryman should object to serving in another capacity. The punishment, however, which lasts three or four hours, is usually effectual, and the "mounted" infantry-man leaves his horse well satisfied with his short service in the cavalry."

CAPTURE OF THE "FLORIDA."

We illustrate on our first page the capture by the Wachusett of the rebel war-steamer Florida, which took place in the Bay of San Salvador October 7, and give the portraits of Captain MORRIS, of the Florida, and Captain COLLINS, of the Wachusett.

The Florida, formerly known as the Oreto, was originally built for the Italian Government, as was alleged, was purchased by the rebels and sent to sea in March, 1862, and has enjoyed a longer lease of predatory life than has been allowed to other privateers. This vessel has outrivaled even the Alabama in its destructive work. She was, after the destruction of the Alabama, the most powerful privateer in the Anglo-Confederate navy. Her burden was 750 tons. She arrived at Bahia, in the Bay of San Salvador, on the 5th of October, having just one week before captured and burned the Monticello off Pernambuco. The United States steamer Wachusett was then in port, and at first the Florida anchored in the offing, but was immediately invited by the Brazilian admiral to come into the harbor, where she lay on the 6th under the guns of the Brazilian forts and the Brazilian fleet. It is stated that during the day efforts were made by some of the citizens of Bahia to induce Captain Morgan to take the Florida outside to fight the Wachusett, but that the Captain declined the engagement. There is nothing to indicate that the Florida came into port for any other purpose than to take in coals and provisions. On the night of the 6th Captain Morgan and a good portion of his crew were on shore. The Wachusett was lying just outside the harbor. This sort is a favorite resort for Confederate privateers, because it has three separate channels out. This, of course, was an unfavorable feature in Captain Collins's view of the situation, since the Florida might easily escape by one of these channels under cover of the darkness. He called a council of his officers, and to the debate which followed one thing was especially considered, namely, that the Florida had repeatedly seized and burned American vessels within three miles of the Brazilian coast. With but one dissenting vote it was determined to seize the Florida at her anchorage. The fact that there was a fleet, and that the consideration already alluded to was the principal reason in favor of the extraordinary measure determined upon, leaves us room for supposing that the same reason was adopted with either the expressed or implied consent of the Brazilian authorities. At any rate the seizure was determined upon, and at 3 A.M. on the morning of the 7th the cables were slipped, and the Wachusett approached the Florida with the intention of striking her amidships and send her at once to the bottom. This might have passed for an accidental collision, and thus the international question have been evaded. But the collision did not produce the intended effect. Captain Collins thoroughly regarded the surrender of the Florida. The officer in charge of the latter replied that, under the circumstances, he surrendered, and immediately vessel, her guns having been removed to the Wachusett, was tied to that vessel, and was carried out to sea. Those are the facts of the capture, and it is uncertain as yet whether the Brazilian Government will make a protest against it. If it does, the question then becomes one of self-justification, and in case it is proved that the Florida has captured any of our vessels within the limits of Brazilian jurisdiction the capture will stand simply as simply a measure of retaliation.

The Wachusett was built in the Charlestown Navy-yard, and launched in 1861. Her length is 198 feet, breadth of beam 33, and depth 15. She carries a battery armament consisting of 11 and 9-inch Dahlgren pivot guns, two 30-pound rifles, and eight broadside guns. Previous to her cruise in search of privateers she was employed as flag-ship on James River.

Captain NAPOLEON COLLINS was born in Pennsylvania, and is therefore fifty years of age. In 1834, appointed a midshipman in the navy, and made his first cruise on the sloop of war Natchez under Commodore Kearney, of the West India Squadron. In 1839 he entered the naval school at Philadelphia. He was afterward attached to the sloop of war Boston, and to the frigate Constellation as acting master; in 1846, having spent four years at home he was ordered to the sloop of war Saratoga, on the African coast, having been promoted to a Lieutenancy. In 1853 we find him in service on Lake Erie six years afterward, under FARRAGUT, as the executive officer of the navy-yard at Mares Island, California, and in 1860, having again served as Lake Erie for a few months, he was ordered to the sloop of war Vandalia under the present Admiral S. P. LEE, in the East India Squadron. He was on the vessel when the Vandalia, made conquest of the gun-boat Unadilla, which was one of the vessels engaged in Admiral DU PONT'S Port Royal expedition. During the winter of 1861 and 1862 he was very actively engaged with the Unadilla, in company with the other gun-boats, in operations on the ports and sounds on the coast of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, under the command of Admiral DU PONT. On the 16th of July, 1862, he was promoted to his present rank as full commander, standing at present No. 19 on the list. In September, 1862, he was detached from the command of the Unadilla and placed in command of the Octorara, cruising in the West Indies in search of blockade-runners. Here he was successful in taking some valuable prizes, and maintaining as sharp a blockade as the circumstances and the speed of his vessel would permit.

In August, 1863, he was detached from the Octorara, and ordered ordered to the command of the steam-sloop Wachusett, on special service, and sent some months since in search of the privateer Florida. In this pursuit he has been employed for months, and succeeded finally in capturing the privateer in the manner above stated. He has been thirty years in the naval service, of which he has spent over twenty-one at sea.

The Florida was originally under the command of Captain MAURY; at the time of her capture she was commanded by C. MORGAN[illegible] MORRIS. The portrait which we give of Captain MORGAN is from a photograph taken a few months ago at Brest, France, which port the Florida entered September 4, 1863. He has been Captain of this privateer for more than a year. The Florida, it will be remembered, was for some months detained at Brest by the French Government.

RUNNING THE BLOCKADE.

On pages 760 and 761 we illustrate the chase of a blockade-runner by a portion of one of our squadrons. This is an event now of everyday occurrence. In fact, a peculiar sort of commerce has sprung up, the profits of which rest upon the chances of running the American blockade. The chief enterprises of this commerce is Wilmington, North Carolina. The foreign lean, which forms the most substantial support of the Confederate financial system, rests entirely upon the chances of Confederate vessels laden with cotton evading our blockading vessels in going out; and the Confederate Ordnance Department has subsisted on the chances of vessels from abroad laden with guns and ammunition evading our blockaders in coming in. Vessels engaged in this transit to and fro are built by secret companies, who trust with all the confidence of a BECKLE in the average of so many successes in so many trips, and in the long run they make enormous profits notwithstanding the number of special instances in which they come to grief. The interior of ships engaged in running the blockade is regulated according to the same laws of chance. If Wilmington were in our possession the whole basin of this new and prosperous commerce would undergo a material alteration.

Many of the ships of our blockading fleet have grown rich out of the results of their captures. According to the PRIZE LAW one half of every prize goes to the Government. The other half is divided among the officers and seamen of the capturing fleet according to their monthly pay.

DREAMLAND.

Of the sweet old legends
Beckoning, long ago,
And silvery, bell-like voices
Tell of an unknown land,

Where magic roses blossom
In the evening's golden light,
And the air is laden with fragrance
From the lilies silver-white.

The trees, with their waving branches,
Murmur a fairy song,
And the brooklet merrily dances
As it ripples and gurgles along.

And tender, enchanting love-songs
Float on the balmy breeze,
And one hear's unspeakable longing
By their music is set at ease.

Would that my steps could reach it,
That happy, flowery strand!
For all my earthly affections
Would cease in that fairy land.

Oft in my dreams I see it,
In its glamour bright and fair,
But with daylight's earliest glimmer
It vanishes into air.

GOLDEN FIPPINS.

"NOW, Ry, seriously, you are not vexed with me? You yourself would have been the first to bid me go."

Fay bent below the precipitous ledge of the mountain path the valley seemed to swim in misty depths of golden haze, among the overhanging trees, a deep-dyed sumach tosse' its crest of crimson plumes in the spicy air mid October and the cool dark green of the hemlock glowed and the burning coals in the tangled wilderness of the woods. It was a rare pretty bed-ground for wood nymph, or hamadryad, and Rachel Martin's attitude was unconsciously artistic as she played with the blue asters that covered her little basket of hickory nuts, while from the tall tree whose giant branches overtopped the whole forest.

She was a pretty picture, with rose-brooding blue eyes and a mouth like a magnified cranberry, while the roses on her cheek seemed to come in with every breath she drew, and the warm touches of sunshine on her brow gave additional charm to her fresh, rustic beauty. Mark Douglas knew that the wisest method, but separated them, and tried to take the brown hand in his, but it was drawn away with decided quickness.

"Ry, Ry, Ry!"

Ah, he did not see the blood mantling to her cheek, under the envious shadow of the arrogant "Shaker-bonnet"—he did not hear the quick, stormy throbbing of the petulant heart. "Deserted," indeed! that was unpardonable! Never so much as went to Boston without asking her leave, and Chesley Jenkins had distinctly intimated that the whole programme of the Saturday excursion was to be allocated solely by Miss Martin's wish. Yes, it was all very well for Captain Mark to stay at home, effecting a change in the fashion of the cloth of the uniform, and didn't object to the martial éclat. But to go down among the rebels without so much as consulting her wishes! "Deserted," indeed! "sought thought that was altogether a different thing.

"I see you are in no mood to discuss this matter impartially just now, Rachel," Captain Mark said gravely. "I had thought, I had hoped to find you feeling differently about it."

"In no mood!" Rachel colored hot scarlet. What right had Mark Douglas to treat her like a naughty child?

"I beg your pardon, Captain Douglas," she said, petulantly; "it isn't at all necessary to discuss a matter which is entirely settled."

Now Mark Douglas was only a man, with all the infirmities incident to mankind. He bit his lip, and his brow grew dark.

"Rachel, you seem to have forgotten the engagement."

"Engagement!" she repeated, sharply. "I am tired of an engagement that only fetters one party while the other is free as air."

"Tired!" He hesitated a moment, as if vainly striving to command his voice: "Do you wish to be released, Ray?"

She did not answer—perhaps she was not quite prepared for this phase of affairs.

"Tell me—yes or no!" he demanded, sternly.

"Yes," she answered, with pettish abruptness. "I release you, Captain."

Gone? Yes, he was gone. She watched him ascending the mountain side with quick, even strides under the scarlet draperies of clinging vines, through patches of deep, still shadow into belts of golden sunshine, until the overhanging rock hid him from her view; yet it seemed so difficult to believe that he was really gone.

She looked down at the tiny engagement-ring that usually sat on her forefinger—a simple turquoise set in virgin gold, whose blue glimmered dimly through her tears—and she could not but remember the tender words with which he had placed it on her finger.

"Let it be a token between us, dearest, like the signet rings of old times. Wherever I may be, this ring, will always bring my heart back to its queen. And now!

"I need not to have returned it," she pondered, shrinking as if the slender circlet of gold were a ring of the fiercest fire-stone!

So Mark Douglas lost his sweet-heart, and marched down to Petersburg a solitary man, marveling, as many a man has done before him, on the inscrutable mysteries of the female heart.

"Dreffal keen wind, ain't it?" said the Widow Taylor, untying the strings of her worsted hood; "powerful sharp frost last night! Deacon Pettibone's children had a bee, and all Miss Simeon's mornin'-glories is blasted Thankee, Miss Martin, my feet is cold; won't you take the rocking-chair next the fire? Why, Rachel, child, what ails you? all the neighbors are talkin' 'bout how you're changed!"

Rachel colored, and turned away.

"I am well enough."

"I tell ye, Rachel, Miss Martin," began Mrs Taylor, in a mysterious whisper to the elder lady, "you jest take a double handful o' green wilder buck, and boil it down to a quart; undercut tea ain't be—and give her a pint night and mornin'. It's the most strengthening thing!" But I've come round to tell you that Parson's Committee have decided on."

"Ah, indeed?" said Mrs. Martin, inquiringly.

"It all feel to be dreffal thankful for, there's been so good, and—and—every thing's fetched up just about right," intoned the widow; "and so we thought it would be kind o' squarin' up with a marcitul Providence to send a box or tew o' things out to them 'ere children that's a-fightin' like all possessed! It's only accordin' to Scripter, you know, and it would be a kind o' nice little Thanksgivin' gift, you wouldn't it?"

The widow drooped her eyelids sanctimoniously, and went on:

"Miss Darby's kindly gin us a bushel o' them sweet-potatoes they raised in the south pasture lot. They're a little damaged, not exactly fit for market, but there'll be no sickness 'll be glad to get 'em; and Miss Deacon Pettibone has promised us a lot o' their fermented peach sass, and Deacon Wallis he's sent in a couple o' hook marks, and Widow Smith has cooked a peck o' dough-nuts, without no currents. Sugar's so high, and 'tain't likely the soldier-critters 'll know the difference. As for me, I rely like to tell about my neighbors, but I hunted up a few things myself. There's old grannum's old pewter candles, and Mr. Meriam contributes a set o' law-books, that they tell me is powerful interestin', and the Committee calc'lated you and Rachel would help us."

"Of course we will," assented Mrs. Martin, recovering herself from the momentary bewilderment and amusement caused by the Widow Taylor's rambling history of events.

"Then I may as well be off, directly," ejaculated the widow, jumping up; "for I've got to see Miss Deacon Wallis about the turkey yet to-night. Good-evenin' t' ye—and don't forget the willer-bark tea."

Mrs. Martin and Rachel both burst out laughing as the door closed.

"Poor Mrs. Taylor!" said Mrs. Martin.

"Mamma, what are you to do?" demanded Rachel, indignantly. "Such a box for the soldiers! Why it would only be an aggravation!"

"Hush, child—hush!" decreed Mrs. Martin, soothingly: "I'll make up a lot of real dough-nuts, and pack them round the biggest pair of turkeys I can find, with a few bits of little pumpkin pies, and you shall send a barrel of those golden pippins that Mark—that Captain Douglas—the tree Mark Douglas liked so well. They're in the garret, in that old green chest; and be sure and put in plenty of that down straw to prevent their mellerin' against each other."

Rachel obeyed; and Mrs. Martin never had the least idea of the sweet secret, with her trim little figure half into the barrel, as she packed the great fair yellow apples among the yellower straw. If Rachel Martin could only have spoken, what a Thanksgiving story they might have told to the Army of the Potomac!

Mr. Martin's broad face beamed with satisfaction as he harnessed up old Dolly to carry the box and Rachel to Boston.

"It's jes' like you women-folks to keep thinkin' of such things," he declared. "Now it never would have come into my green wooden head—and jest to think how much better our Thanksgivin' dinner'll taste for remembrin' the poor fellers that's a-fightin' for us! Gee up, Dolly!"

And Mr. Martin winked his misty eyes and cracked his whip simultaneously.

"I—don't—see—where—it—can—be!"

The golden pippins were all fetched away from the sweet valley now—the great November sky stretched its dreary canopy of cloud over the glens and forests, and the yellow leaves were raining sadly down around Ray Martin's feet as she hurriedly traversed the mountain path, pushing aside the red and russet drifts with eager, tremulous fingers, and searching as if for some precious lost talisman.

"Then perhaps that it really have dropped it!" she faltered, half aloud. "While I were it I could still fancy our parting was but a dream. Oh, where could I have lost it!"

And she sat down on the twisted beech-root and cried heartily, while the meaning of the chill wind brought back an echoing cadence to her ears.

"Gone—gone!"

"A barrel of golden pippins! O Mars! isn't it jolly?"

The first lieutenant executed an impromptu hornpipe around the barrel as Captain Douglas prized up the cover with a hammer.

"We're very much obliged to Company A," said the latter, entirely. "I hope you didn't forget that, Jennings?"

"Oh, of course I did the polite. Company A was so obliging as to send us the barrel, and keep the great levitation of a box for its own delectation. I just wish you could have seen Dolsley's face when he found it empty."

"What do you mean?"

"Such a conglomeration of decaying vegetables potatoes, sour sweetmeats, old rags, and tow-books! I didn't stop to investigate very closely, however; it was my interest to tell the barrel down half as fast as possible, lest Dudsley should repent of his generosity. I confess I was a little nervous while you were opening the barrel, lest it should contain cold victuals and pine kindlings. Hullo! what's this?" he exclaimed, taking a slip of paper that had been beneath the lid. "'A Thanksgiving remembrance!' Much obliged to you, my unknown friend. 'I'll keep my Thanksgiving now!'"

Douglas read the slip from his friend's hand; a deep flush rose into his cheek as he recognized Ray Martin's delicate and rather peculiar handwriting.

"The same old apples that used to lie like ripens of gold in the long grass of the orchard, and I thought I knew them!" he pondered. "Jennings—"

But Jennings had dodged out to promulgate the good tidings among his fellow-officers. At the same instant Mark Douglas's eye caught a foreign glitter among the yellow straw.

The turquoise ring!

His heart gave a sudden leap as he remembered the solemn, yet romantic words with which he had placed it on her finger. And then came the revulsion—the anger.

"What a fool I am! as if she could have known the destination of this chance gift!"

Douglas set the cold and colorless voice of reason, a far more welcome tone kept repeating to the ear of his heart, with perpetual refrain,

"She has called me back to her, she has called me back!"

The twilight of Thanksgiving Eve was brooding darkly over Mr. Martin's great, old-fashioned kitchen, where the glow of pine logs afforded the only illumination, save a shrill-voiced cricket piped behind the chimney bricks. Ray saw the red glean of the fire-light on the golden pippins across the seat, as she walked slowly down the sloping path, with a gray shawl wrapped round her head, and fresh carnation, born of the sharp, keen wind, on her cheeks.

She started in quick affright as a footstep sounded among the dry leaves at her side, and a gentle touch fell on her arm.

"Ray!"

And then she knew that the troubled dream was over.

The old clock behind the strings of red pepper had chimed nine before Rachel thought of the question that would have been most natural to ask first.

"Do, how—how—what made you come back?"

"You summoned me, Ray."

"I? Never, Mark!"

He held up the turquoise ring with an arch look of defiance, and all at once the truth broke upon her.

"Let me put it on your finger once again, Ray, never to be removed except for the wedding-ring of gold!"

But her head droop an instant upon his shoulder, and then looked up through sparkling tears.

"Oh, Mark! this will be the most real Thanksgiving of my life!"

AN ADVENTURE OF A YOUNG MAN FROM THE COUNTRY.

WE young farmers of the new generation like to wear a smart shiny hat up in London. Our billycocks and wide-awakes are good enough for field and market, but up in the big town we're a fancy to be genteel; and you may be sure I wanted to look nice the day my brother might—the last of the Cattle Show at Islington—when I was going up to Uncle Iberry's in Dalston, for Cousin Kitty is, without exception, the most satisfactory lady in London. How she did laugh at me that day I went with her to the Zoological Gardens, when I got a pair of gloves to cover a nine inch hand, and was all the way between the Angel and the Colosseum trying to get them on without them. She declared it was only my awkwardness that hindered their fitting, wouldn't let me stop to buy another pair, and, in the end, I had to split the cuff, as she looks so pretty all the time she's laughing at you that you can't be annoyed with her. No wonder, then, I wanted to look smart.

It was a darkish night, with a bit of a breeze stealing, as I picked my way through those quiet streets that lie between the Lower Road Islington and Dalston. I think they call that part De Beauvoir Town, but as I came to the corner of a street, and was racking my brains for a reparte to Miss Kitty's first bit of satire, a strong puff of wind sprang up, whipped off my smart shiny hat as neat as need be, and dropped it into an area. This was certainly a nuisance, but not a nuisance without remedy. I rang at the area bell once, twice, thrice, and got no answer. I sounded the lion's-head knocker once, twice, thrice, and got no answer. Then I looked up at the windows, and saw, what I had not observed before, that there was a bill in one of them announcing "This House to be Let." It was too dark to read the name of the agent, and I was just going to knock next door, and ask them if they knew who kept the key; or, supposing they didn't know who kept the key, if they would oblige me with their Turk's-head broom to fish up my hat with—I was just going to do this, for I couldn't bear the notion of facing Kitty without a hat, let alone the price of it, seventeen and sixpence, when to my astonishment the door, as I happened to lean up against it, moved slightly inward. I suppose it hadn't been hasped at all; at any rate, I gave a gentle push, and walked boldly in. "This is a lucky piece of carelessness on somebody's part," thought I to myself. "I shall just step down to the kitchen, unfasten the back-door, regain my hat, and slip away without any body being the wiser." I found the front-door, and groped my way down the kitchen stairs. It was pitch-dark, and I wished I had put some matches; but as I hadn't got any, wishing was no good, and, moreover, I saw a faint light glimmering under the kitchen-door, which showed me there must be a fire in the grate. I tried the kitchen-door: it was locked, and the key was gone! I felt about, and found the back-door without the area; it was locked, and the key was gone also! Here was a pretty go, as the Cockneys say. The back-door, as I ascertained by feeling the hinges, opened toward me, so it was of no use meddling with that; but I had a wonderful great mind to kick in the kitchen-door, which was made to open inward. Setting aside, however, the chance of being pulled up for burglary (and why the deuce should be to the Papworths, who have rented the same farm since Charles II.'s time?), what should I do, after getting the door open? Why, I should refasten the window (I had noticed when outside that it was shuttered up), climb out into the area, and recover my hat. But supposing a policeman should pass just as my body was half-way through—why, to a dead certainty, he would lock me up on suspicion. That would never do. I must try the back-door, determined to pick the lock. "I dare say that's hanging as much nothing it ought," I said; "still it don't make so much noise. If I can only find an old nail or a bit of wire, I'll try it." So I crept up stairs again, and went into the front parlor. I groped all round the room, passed my hand along the mantle-piece and the window-frame without finding so much as a tag with a hook. I could get no help there, I ventured into the front-parlor. All of a sudden a thought struck me: why shouldn't I unfasten the shutters and get into the area? That sounds easy enough; but how about getting back again? "It's a deep area, certainly," I said to myself, "and there you'll be caged, my boy, like a bear in his den." All the time I was thinking in this way, I was feeling about the room for house-breaking tool. Presently I stumbled over something; I put down my hand and picked up a shoe. "Bother this and the kitchen-door!" I said, "I thinks I, "there must be somebody taking care of the house." The next moment I stumbled again. This time I had run against a second shoe, and I hesitated. I put out my hand cautiously, and laid it on—somebody's nose! The owner of the nose didn't stir. It took the liberty of feeling the head to learn whether I was in company with a lady or a gentleman. It was a man, head of hair, very rough and wiry, and bald on the poll.

"You're in an awkward predicament, Jack Papworth," I said to myself; "you'd better get yourself out of it as soon as possible." I sneaked on tip-toe toward the door.

But my humble against the bedstead had disturbed the sleeper; he began to grunt and turn about uneasily. I was just about to quit the room, and venture barefooted into the street, when he sat up in bed (so I judged by the sound, for the room was as dark as a cellar), and called out, "Kitty?"

For a moment the name startled me; I forgot that there might possibly be more than one Kitty in that wilderness of a city. I stood by the door, held my breath, and made no answer.

"Kitty, Kitty, I say: you shall come back without him, are you?" said the man in a beseeching sort of voice.

I stood perfectly still, holding my breath, and, considering what I should do. Better slip out of the house, and take the chance of losing my hat, than get locked up on a charge of burglary? I had made a laughing-stock before all the Cockneys in their newspapers. Besides, I needn't lose my hat; the first policeman I meet is sure to serve me a suspicious character for being bareheaded, so I'll tell him my case, and give him half-a-crown to get my hat again. But, on the other hand, it's a ticklish job. This fellow in bed may be a desperate character, for aught I know of it. He must be somemost likely crazy, to sleep in an empty house without a stick of furniture about him. Never mind, I'll chance it; I'll make a move for the street door.

All this cogitation of mine passed through my head like lightning, though I've taken so long to tell it. I made a half-hearted step toward the door. As soon as ever I did so, the man in bed called out in an excited voice: "That's a man's step! Why, Jack, it's you! Ah! I see how it is; you wanted to surprise me, but you haven't, my dear Jack. I've been such a fool as to get drunk, and smoke; and the runaway knocks has been uncommon bad last night (parents ought to be ashamed of themselves not to send their children to bed sooner, I say), but it's boys that does it); but I've been dreaming about you all the time. It is you, Jack, ain't it?"

He said these last words in a more beseeching way that I couldn't help answering, though in a disguised voice, "It is."

"Then where's Kitty?"

"I hope to see her presently—as soon as I get my hat," I added, under my breath.

"Gone to the cook-shop to get something nice and hot in honor of you, Jack, eh?" said the man in bed. "I wonder what it'll be. Maybe an oil-pie with baked tarts—ah! or a plate of savory almonde beef—ah! or a nice dish of bited trips and lemons—a-h!" As he enumerated each of these dishes the man in bed smacked his lips with extraordinary relish.

To tell the truth, I was getting interested. The women-folk down at the farm always say I'm as curious as one of their own sex, and I wanted to know the meaning of all this. This man evidently mistook me for some friend of his own, of whom he was very fond and very proud.

"You seem to like good eating," I ventured to say.

"Why, Jack, my boy, it's one of the few pleasures I have left. Thank God, my appetite's always good. And when a man's lost the use of his limbs, and can't see out of his eyes, he makes the best he can of his stomach. I'd ask you to light a candle, Jack, but I'm half-ashamed for you to see what a bachelor's den like this I've become. Stop! stop! when you emigrated—you understand me, Jack" (he said this in a curious sly way)—"I was as bachelor and well-growed a man as you'd wish to see, warn't I, Jack?"

"You were."

"And now I'm a useless cripple."

"How did it happen?"

"What! you never got Kitty's letter, directed Post-office, Hobart Town, Van Diemen's Land? No, I don't suppose you ever did, else you'd have said something about my accident when you wrote to tell us you were coming home. But hasn't Kitty told you coming along in the cab?"

"Not a word."

"Ah, poor soul! she didn't like to grieve you, Jack. Well, this is how it was. I was working at the gaining-place at the Victoria docks at Hounslow. The mill blew up (they mostly do about once in five year) and blew me along with it—blew me into a good deal of pieces, Jack; and they sewed me down a miserable blind cripple. As he said these last words his voice filled him, and he shed tears.

"And how do you manage to live?"

"Well, Jack, the parish allows me very handsomely. They allow me ten shillings a week, and Kitty takes care of empty houses. We contrive to scratch along pretty well, considering. Jack, you've never offered your brother your hand yet. Let me shake your hand, Jack, even if you didn't care to light a candle."

I stepped forward and gave him my hand.

"Luvk, Jack, why, your hand's almost like a gentlement's hand! It ain't so soft as a dress-maker's or a haberdasher's, it's about equal to a master builder's."

"You seem to know all about hands," I observed.

"Ah!" he answered, with a sigh, "that comes of want of eyes. When I had my sight I took no note of such things, but now I've got a delicate touch; and as I lie here all day long I press down to char-women, are kind enough to come and see me, and shake hands with me, why, in course I get a deal of practice. Jack, you could come here with that supper (I hope it's tripe); I'm getting that hungry I could eat a shilling's worth."

I began to feel ashamed. "I must try and recover my hat," I thought, "before Kitty comes in, or she will, of course, discover the deception."

"Are you afraid of thieves here?" I asked.

"Why?"

"Because I see you lock up your kitchen and back-door. Can you tell me where the back-door key hangs?"

"It don't hang nowhere," replied the cripple. "It's in my missis's pocket."

"And the kitchen-door key?"

"In her pocket. She keeps 'em all in her pocket. Bless you, Jack, what with area sneaks and mischievous children the place would be stripped if we warn't to lock every thing up after dark."

Here was another disappointment. If I wanted to get my hat I must wait till Kitty returned and fetch her bodily. But how shall I account to her for— I was interrupted in my reflections by my companion, who exclaimed, "Jack, what's keeping you? take a look at your poor brother Bob. You'll find the matches in one of my shoes, and the candlestick is under the window-sill."

I lighted the candle, and saw a man of about forty years of age lying on a small stretcher bedstead in the middle of the apartment. His face had evidently been once comely, though now disfigured by scars. His eyes were closed, as if he was any thing but blind. Altogether his appearance didn't see it.

"You are able to wear shoes then, Bob," I said.

"Ay, but you may notice they're made of cloth, and three sizes too big for me. I had a neat foot once, Jack, but it's swelled up somehow. I can't look like here like a mummy all day; I sit by the kitchen fire."

"How do you get up and down stairs?"

"Would you believe it, Jack?—she carries me. I dare say you thought her a rough one to look at, but she's just the contrary in her mind. She's a strong in the back as a brewer's horse. If I'd had the pick of the country of Middlesex I couldn't have married a kinder-hearted woman. And the marriage was for love. It was arter the accident—you understand me, Jack. I was brought to the church in a hatchcher, Jack. How the neighbors flocked out in the street was at their winders to see me lifted out by the firemen, and helped, and assisted, and carried up for the sake of my pension, but I know better, Jack. It was out of downright pity, and knowing the good-looking girl I was to marry, that all this kind come in. She must ha' gone a desperate long way arter that tripe. My appetite's getting outrageous. Tell us about Van Diemen's Land, Jack, to pass the time away."

I hesitated, for I knew very little more about Van Diemen's Land than I do about the Moon.

"Ah! I see how it is, Jack," said the cripple; "you're ashamed, and no wonder. I like you the better for it. But you needn't mind now. You've served out your seven year, and as I always said, you was young, and led away by Bill Hawkins. And Jack," he added, confidentially, "we've always kept up the notion in the family that it was Poaching to begin. It sounds a deal better than—you know what; and I've maintained it was Poaching so long that I've got to believe it myself."

"I'm glad to hear you say so," I replied, gravely.

"But I say, Jack," pursued the cripple, "transportation can't be as bad as it's represented. It has softened your voice, made you talk better, and given you quite a touch of gentility. You was a roughish young blade when I bade you good-by at Millbank Penitentiary. I've received now Bill Hawkins pierced because I gave you mother's little cheap Bible? I've put it quite away with your quotation, I'm told. You was in one of the last batches."

Here was a pretty position for a respectable young farmer to occupy, whose family had always kept a good name for fair dealing and honest industry since Charles II.'s time. For the sake of recovering a seventeen-and-sixpenny hat, I was actually pretending to be somebody else, and that somebody else a returned convict; but I couldn't bear to tell this poor helpless man that I had been playing a trick on him. He had set his heart on seeing his prodigal brother, and he would be so grieved if I discovered him; so, having begun the adventure, I determined to carry it through. The difficulty was how to manage it successfully; in other words, how to get back my hat without an unpleasant squabble. The matter stood thus: Kitty might be expected to return at any moment, accompanied by her real brother-in-law; she would naturally denounce me as an impostor, and instead of recovering my hat, I might possibly discover that my face was as maturally developed as her back, not to mention the help which the returned transport would be sure to give me. I determined to feel my way by degrees, and as, luckily, my entertainer was a simple-minded man, to follow, to learn from him exactly how the land lay.

"What name d'ye suppose I've gone under, Bob, since I've got such a brother? I said.

"Not Sladden, Jack," answered the cripple, ansiously; "never Sladden, I should hope. Though you're a rich man, and I'm a poor one, you mustn't recollect, Jack, the name of Sladden was an honest name till you went and tarnished it."

"No, Bob, I haven't dream of such a thing; I call myself Thompson."

"That's right," returned the cripple. "Your hand, Jack. I'm a brother! I shall always be to you in brotherly feelings, though different in name. And I say, Jack, what did you tell Kitty? Because she's been a-thinking that you went under government; she believes you was a bounty ticket. What did you say to her?"

"Bob, shall I tell you a little secret?"

"What is it?"

"I haven't seen Kitty yet."

"Not seen Kitty yet? Why, you came here with her."

"No, I didn't."

"How did you find your way in, then?"

"The door was ajar."

"I can't credit it. Kitty'd never leave the front door open."

I called for once, though; I knocked and rang before I found it out."

"Ay, and I thought it was a runaway knock and ring. Find out on earth is Kitty? Didn't you see her aboard the vessel?"

"No."

"Jack," he exclaimed, suddenly seizing my hand, "are you sure you are playing no trick on me? Remember, I'm a poor helpless creature. Where is Kitty?"

"On my honor, I don't know."

"Hush!" he said, putting his hand to his ear—"hush! there's a footstep coming up to the door. It's hers; I know her foot among a hundred; and she's alone."

Here last three words made me decide what course to adopt. As a heavy masculine-sounding foot came to the front door I overset the candlestick in my accident.

"There," said I, "my awkwardness has left us in the dark."

"So much the better, Jack," replied the cripple. "She's missed you down at the ship; we'll give her an agreeable surprise."

Somebody opened the street-door with a latch-key and advanced into the passage. I confess I felt rather uncomfortable; but I stood still and held nothing. Presently a rather gruff female voice exclaimed: "Bob, Bob, are you asleep?"

"Kitty!" Not a bit of it, my dear Kitty," replied the cripple cheerily, "but wide awake, and as hungry as a butcher."

"Strike a light, then—you know where the matches are," said the lady, who appeared to be carrying her bonnet-strings. "A pretty mess, Bob," she went on to say, "you've led me for nothing. There was no such name as Sladden aboard the ship."

He came over under the name of Thompson, Kitty."

"How do you know?"

"Because I've seen him."

"Where?"

"Here," said Mr. Sladden, as he struck a match and relighted the candle. "Brother Jack, at your service. Look at him, Kitty, and tell me what you think of him."

It was a trying moment. Mrs. Sladden was a tall, bony, raw-featured woman of five-and-forty. She took the candle out of her husband's hand and submitted me to a critical examination.

"Well, Kitty, what do you think of him?" repeated the cripple with a pleased smile upon his face.

"Why, Bob," answered Mrs. Sladden, "you always told me that your brother Jack was a rough fellow; I think he looks quite the gentleman. Welcome to Old England, Mr. Jack," she said, extending her hand: "ours is but a poor place, but such as it is you're welcome to it."

I felt like a miserable humbug as my supposed sister-in-law put her hard horsed hand into mine; but what could I do? I had trodden the downward path of deception; I was bound to follow it to the end. So after the lapse of nine minutes, which were spent in general conversation, I said to Kitty, I speak to you here for a few moments, Mrs. Sladden?"

"Certainly, Sir," replied the poor unsuspecting woman, treating me with immense respect. "Step down stairs to the kitchen, please; 'tis the only comfortable room in the house. And as my poor husband made shift to get up and let you in, did he?"

"Here I am, at any rate, Mrs. Sladden," said I, with a smile as she undecked the kitchen-fire.

"And what was it you might be wishing to say to me, Mr. Jack?" she asked.

"I just want you to unfasten the back-door leading to the area. The fact is, that my hat blew off as I was coming round the corner of the street, and has fallen down there."

"Oh, is that all, Sir?" said Mrs. Sladden, laughing, as she fell in love with me. "I'll get it."

"What a shame it is to me to deceive such an amiable couple," thought I; "still I must recover my hat."

My reputed sister-in-law was in the act of inserting the key into the key-hole when the sound of wheels was heard outside, followed by a thundering rat-tat-tat at the street-door.

"Bless me, who can that be?" exclaimed Mrs. Sladden, as she rushed up stairs with the unused key in her hand. I followed her with trembling steps. I have since ascertained that Jack hesitated. She opened the door to a many-caped cabman, whose vehicle stood at the edge of the pavement.

"That's right," shouted a well-known voice from the cab window. "Give a hairistocratic ran-tan, cabby; I'm a gentleman now, every inch of me."

The next moment Kitty and I met face to face, addressing my late sister-in-law. I waited to hear no more, but, barefooted as I was, darted down the steps into the street. A rut-brown face, ornamented with a great shaggy yellow beard, was thrust from the cab window, and a jolly voice exclaimed, "Hoile! Brother Bob!"

I made no answer, but run away as fast as my legs could carry me. When I had placed a good half-mile between myself and Mr. Sladden's abode I fell into a walk, and tied my handkerchief over my head. I had accomplished the object of the police; and as soon as I reached a cab-stand got into a cab and returned alone to my hotel. I did not venture to visit the Iberyes that night; and as for inquiring after my seventeen-and-sixpenny hat, I left to a gentleman of the name of De Beauvoir Town's out for aught I know it may be lying in that area still.

THE SONG OF THE DRUM

Rataplan! rataplan! rataplan!
Fellow and follow me! every true man!
Hark to the sound of the rolling drum.
Come with the drum! come with me, come with me, come
Follow me! follow me! follow me, now!
Come from the anvil, come from the plow;
Leave the dull counter and desk to thrumm your lives;
Leave home, leave friends, leave your children, your wives
Hark to the sound of the rolling drum.
Come with me! come with me! come with me, come!
Follow me! follow me! every one!
To where the white camps shine in the sun!

Rataplan! rataplan! rataplan!
Follow me! follow me! every true man!
From the crowded streets of the city come,
Follow the drum, the drum, the drum!
From fields where the lithe binds chirp and sing,
From woods where your sturdy axes ring;
From the gay jar in the tavern to stand,
Grasp the musket firm in your hand,
There's a grander place in the world for you,
Where the cannon-balls fly like hail in a shoo.

Come with me! come with me! come with me, come!
Follow the drum, the drum, the drum!
Come with me where the camps shine white,
Where the fife sounds merry and light,
Where the loud reveille when morning breaks,
And the golden eye of the dawn awakes;
Come with me out to the trenches then,
Where are gathered scores of your fellow-men
Beginning to dig with pick and spade
Holes in the way intrenchments are made;
There's a puff of smoke, and now comes a shell,
Like a yonder, there, where it bursts and fell;
Nobody hurt; and above on the hill
Our batteries, until this moment still,
Now blaze away all in a minute alone,
And a shout goes up from our gallant boys;
Rataplan! rataplan! rataplan!
Here is the life for every true man.

Come with me now to the picket, come!
Follow the drum, the drum, the drum!
That's a sharpshooter's rifle we hear,
Where are the bullets which seem so near;
There's another rifle, that shrill, sharp sound,
And yonder's a wounded man on the ground.
With the blood flowing out in a crimson tide
From a gaping hole in his quivering side;
Short orders and pale are the sights you see,
For this is where only men should be.

Rataplan! rataplan! rataplan!
Follow me, follow me, every true man!
Come with me over the battle-field, come!
Follow the drum, the drum, the drum!
Through the smoke and the dust and the storm of lead;
Adown this gully piled deep with dead,
And along the edge of this shattered wood
Where the trees are splintered and shot with blood,
Then on through this trampled field of corn
Where the once head leaves into shreds are torn,
Into the valley of death we go,
Where the dead and wounded are every where seen;
Rataplan! rataplan! rataplan!
Follow me, follow me, every true man!
Follow me on through the fiery breath
Of the vengeful cannon, sentence death;
On through the battle's smoke and glare,
Follow me, follow me every where!
And hear the cries and the awful groans,
The piercing shrieks and the feeble moans,
And the dying shout from the lips of one
When a work is stormed, and a victory won;
Rataplan! rataplan! rataplan!
This is the death for every true man!

JOE BOYNTON'S COUSIN.

"I've a letter from Aunt Jane's girl, Joseph," Miss Livy Boynton said to her brother as he sat down to the supper-table after a hard day's work mowing.

Miss Livy was tall, spare, black-eyed, and thirty-five at least. Joseph was about six feet two in height—a great, strong, well-made fellow, erect as a young pine, and carrying his head, as I have never seen any other man but the real Western lords of the soil—up, and a little backward, as though they were searching the distance for still other regions to furrow with their bold plows.

Joseph shut up asking glance at his sister, whose purse-proud lip ines indicative of something beyond the letter.

"She's coming to spend the summer with us."

"What?"

"Aunt Jane's girl's coming to spend the summer with us. She'll be here about harvest-time, I reckon—just in time to see us bring a girl to help me through."

Miss Livy smiled with sarcastic grimness. Joseph looked disturbed.

"I wonder what sends her away out here."

Aunt Jane's girl lived in New York—was a fullyfledged young lady, something of a belle it was presumable, and it did seem a curious freak, to say the least, that she should deliberately quit those civilized haunts for the Illinois wilds. But when Joseph came to read the letter he was touched at an underlying vein that seemed somehow in it, and one sentence in particular moved him. "You know I've never seen any of mamma's relations, my dear, dead mamma." The more that it reminded him how close had been the attachment between his mother and Aunt Jane—so close as though there had been a tie of blood between them —and there was not, she having been only a stepsister to his father.

He laid the rose-tinted sheet down gingerly, as though fearful that his great strong fingers would spill it, and with his usual thoughtful consideration of ness from it to the plain but white-walled room, with its bare but well-scoured boards; and there he walked into the front room, as Miss Livy called the best room of the farm-house. Joe looked thoughtfully in the mirror of rag carpet, the six wooden chairs ranged with mathematical precision about, the wooden clock on the mantle-piece, the four colored prints on the four walls, at regular distances from each other, and wondered what the New York belle would say to them all. I'm afraid he ended by deeply wishing she would stay at home.

But she didn't. She came, as Livy had she would, in the midst of harvesting, and in the very midst of the fret and worry of putting dinner on the table for twenty "hands."

"Do, for mercy's sake, go in and tell her to take off her bonnet and shawl!" snapped Miss Livy, as she hurried about, grumping under her breath ever of an immense pudding, from which the raisins were bursting lusciously.

Joseph, who was crowding his six feet two as far as possible into a corner of the little kitchen, turned very red, and would a great deal rather have gone back to the harvest-field without his dinner than to have faced this New York cousin, "and in this rig too," glancing at his coarse boots and his blue cotton blouse, spread at the throat for coolness. But it had to be done. So buttoning the collar of his blouse, and giving his curly hair a delicate backward toss, he went in, with his quick, glancing, hazel eyes in a restless glitter of excitement at the momentous news of the coming.

The front door was open, and in it stood a very little lady in a gray dress and cloak, and with something on her head that looked like a cross between Joe's Sunday stove-pipe and his everyday Panama. It was "mighty pretty though," Joe found thing to observe inwardly in spite of his embarrassment, and the softest of gold bright curls floated back and mingled with the flutter of the dropped black plume.

She turned quickly at the sound of Joe's heavy step, and lifting a pair of eager blue eyes and extending two pretty little hands, exclaimed in a voice of mingled laughter, tears, and trembling,

"Is this Cousin Joe?"

Awkwardly enough Joe let both the little hands flutter like snow-birds into his; but he laughed a short, mellow, pleased laugh, saying cordially,

"I reckon that's mean Joe!"

Her pretty face drooped an instant with a half sob, and then, laughing—though her lips quivered yet—she said,

"It's too bad to cry when I'm so glad, isn't it?"

Joe tried to do the honors in orthodox fashion; but though he was pleased and much gratified by the frank gladness and unconstraint of Estelle (that was her name), he felt, as every unsophisticated gentlemen than he have, quite too conscious of the presence of this most beautiful woman he had ever seen, and found it very difficult to dispose of his feet and hands satisfactorily.

Estelle, meanwhile, was thinking, "How handsome he is, but how awkward!" But the charitable, forbearing no consciousness when the "men" crowded into the room to the dinner which had been set for them in there, unless to droop her hat a little more over her face. She had so many things to tell—messages from her father, funny little episodes of the journey, etc.

Miss Livy came presently and ordered Joe off to his dinner, with the most apologetic fascinating contrary aside to Estelle, "We'll have ours when the men are gone!"

Estelle thought it rather queer that no dinner was offered her until the men had gone; and she thought it queerer yet when Eliza, Miss Livy's "hired girl," was summoned in from the kitchen to eat with her and Miss Livy, and formally introduced as Miss Hopkins. She would have liked to have had Joe stay in and entertain her; and when he came from the field at night she fluttered out to meet him, clad in some blue gauzy fabric that floated about her like a cloud, and put poor Joe—whose face was grimed with sweat and dust—quite to the blush. She was quick-witted though, and fluttered smilingly away again till he had undergone some sort of a renovating process, and joined her looking so handsome and full of stalwart grace, in spite of his coarse dress and his bashfulness, that she could not help saying to herself,

"If he were only dressed decently, and I could promenade Broadway with him, wouldn't he create a sensation?"

She and Joe got on amazingly well, though Miss Livy looked rather coldly on. Joe could talk as well as some other gentlemen Estelle knew, perhaps even better, and upon topics that Estelle had seldom wonder how Cousin Joe came to know so much. He had got over his bashfulness, and the manner was gaining on very fast. Every day the farm kept him, he found a good many spare hours for Estelle. When some gentleman who had known Estelle at home called on her at the farm, and spent an entire evening with her, Joe had made some excuse for absenting himself, but he was lurking in the locust grove all the time, watching Mr. Lessbrook and Estelle as they chatted in the door-way, with something the feeling a sunflower might be supposed to have in watching two magnolia blossoms.

The following evening Joe made some excuse not to come into the house until it was too late to see Estelle. The next night it was the same way, and Sunday too, etc., till Estelle quite pouted, and wondered what did ail Cousin Joe. She had a habit of teasing him about his many "excuses"

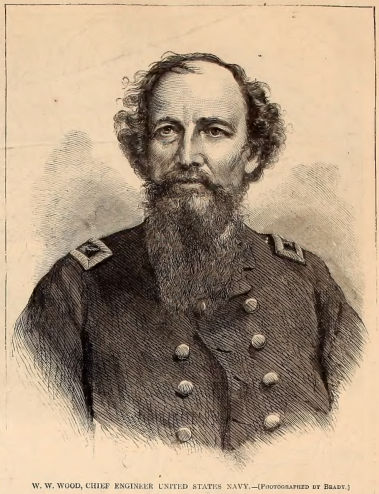
MAJOR-GENERAL GERSHOM MOTT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]



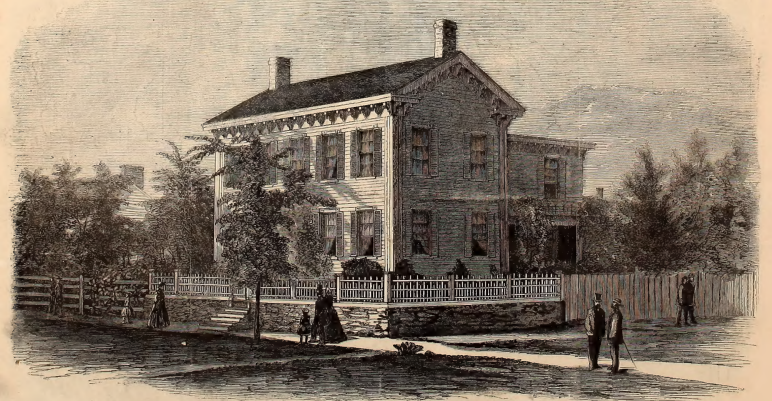
W. W. WOOD, CHIEF ENGINEER UNITED STATES NAVY.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

MAJOR-GENERAL MOTT.

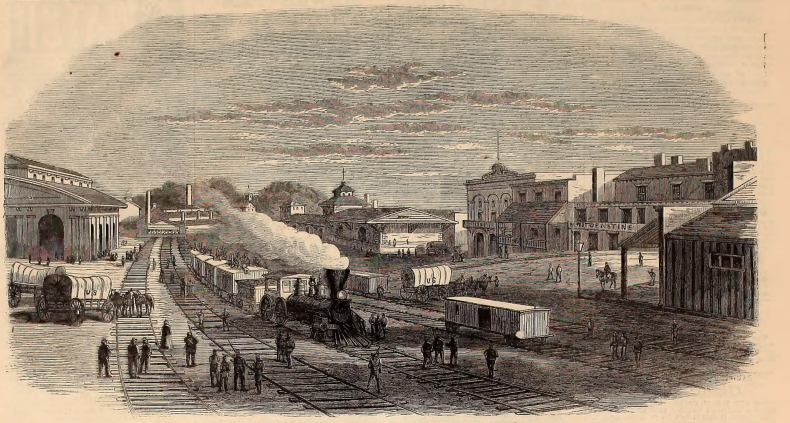
MAJOR-GENERAL GERSHOM MOTT is a native of New Jersey, from which State he brought a full brigade to the Army of the Potomac. This brigade belonged to the First Division of the old Third Corps. Almost from the first organization of the Army of the Potomac he has been identified with its history. He has participated in all the great battles of Virginia. He was wounded in the second battle of Bull Run, and was afterward promoted from the rank of Senior Colonel commanding the New Jersey Brigade to that of Brigadier-General. At Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville he took a prominent part in the operations of SICKLES'S Division, and at the latter he was wounded for the second time. At Gettysburg he was mentioned, as on former occasions, for his gallant services in that battle. In the late campaign from the Rappahannock to the James he has commanded a division of the Second Corps—the same which was formerly commanded by Generals HOOKER and SICKLES in the Third Corps. This division now includes all that is left of the old Third Corps, HOOKER'S "Old Guard." This is a veteran division which has served during the war, being now reduced to a small number. It was this division which was attacked and partially flanked in the late advance to the left.

CHIEF-ENGINEER W. W. WOOD.

CHIEF-ENGINEER W. W. WOOD, United States Navy, whose portrait we publish on this page, is at present attached to the staff of Rear-Admiral GREGORY, as general superintendent of iron-clad steamers and other vessels being constructed for the Navy Department. He was born in Wake County, North Carolina, in the year 1818. Upon the death of his parents, which occurred when he was very young, he was sent to the North to be educated. After passing through college his great taste and natural inclination for mechanics and engineering induced him to connect himself with the Messrs. KEMBLE, of the West Point Foundry, in this city, at the time the largest and most eminent works of the kind in the country. At this establishment he remained for several years, where he acquired a thorough knowledge of engineering; and after an extensive experience, on the reorganization of the Naval Engineer Corps, under the administration of the Hon. GEORGE BANCROFT, in March, 1845, he entered the naval service, in which he has been actively engaged during a period of nearly twenty years. In regard to his past history, the Navy Register for 1864 records him as having been at sea for nearly eight years, and on shore-duty in naval dock-yards and on other special service eight and a half years. He is at present the senior Chief Engineer in the navy, and was selected by Secretary WELLES to fill the responsible position of General Inspector of Steam Machinery, etc.; in which duty is included the construction of our iron-clad fleet, and the machinery for the new class of vessels which are at present being constructed. The new and destructive shell and its arrangement, recently used with such tremendous effect by the gallant Lieutenant CUSHING in the destruction of the rebel ram Albemarle, in the Roanoke River, was designed by him, as also the iron-clad torpedo vessel Stromboli, nearly completed, a powerful engine of destruction in naval warfare.



PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S HOME, SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS.



VIEW IN ATLANTA, GEORGIA.—[SKETCHED BY D. R. BROWN.]

PARIS FASHIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

To multiply a lady's requirements appears to be the predominant idea of all the purveyors of fashion in female dress; and, as though one robe were not sufficient, the modistes have now introduced a description of double dress, which makes the wearer appear to indulge in two at a time—thus increasing the outlay, as, of course, the material for both must be good; otherwise they would not be in unison. One of our illustrations depicts this new style, which we leave to the appreciation of our fair readers.

Bonnets, in the proper acceptation of the term, are still getting smaller by degrees and beautifully less, dwindling gradually away till they have almost the appearance of small caps, richly ornamented with lace, flowers, and birds, the owlet often playing a conspicuous part in the composition of the actual Parisian chapeau. It appears, after all, that the small-sized bonnet is definitively adopted for the approaching winter, during which also the short paletot (mostly in light cloth) will be generally worn for ordinary toilet; but, for full dress, the ruched cansail, the burnous, and the eternal châle de cachemire. For indoor wear red cloth or cashmere vests are very fashionable, and are very becoming to either dark or fair complexions, an advantage which is peculiar to this color, now more popular than ever.

The spirit of exaggeration which we have so frequently observed is now applied to ear-rings, which have acquired almost dangerous dimensions. The jewelers of the Palais-Royale seem to vie with each other daily in the production of something larger than has hitherto been seen, until the proportions of these aural pendants have become quite monstrous. All forms have been adopted and magnified, so that we have the triangular, the long, the wide, and the round cymbal-shaped ear-rings, of a fearful weight, in gold. In keeping with these, the wide leather belts are fastened by buckles of from four to six inches in length, and made of every possible material. Something more agreeable, and certainly far more graceful, is the black lace waistband, fastened behind with a bow and rather short ends. It is to be hoped that these waistbands will finally triumph over the harness-looking belts, which find favor in the eyes of many of the showy Parisiennes.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Morning Dress.—This is altogether an "at home" costume, the color of the dress being generally light, over a gray-colored jupe, which is seen through the openings left expressly in the dress, buttoned in front and behind, made in the manner of a robe de chambre. The material of the dress depicted in our engraving is light-brown cashmere, over a blue jupe. The graduating buttons may be either in dull gold or in mother-of-pearl.

Fig. 2. Ball Dress.—White tarlatan robe, ornamented round the bottom of the skirt with two fluted flounces, surmounted by a straw-colored silk edging. Over the two bottom flounces four others are draped in the style shown in our illustration; and above these two upward jupes is a third, also in white tarlatan, disposed sharp-wise, and in a point behind, while forming a tonic in front. The uppermost jupe is provided with a deep lace trimming, surmounted by a bouillonné, through which a light-blue ribbon is passed. There is a very wide dark-blue silk waistband, fastened by a bow behind. The décolleté corsage is covered with a berthe trimmed with lace and bouillons. The coiffure is arranged in the latest style, the ornamentation consisting of a white and a blue feather, intertwined, and partly concealing the golden comb.

Fig. 3. Walking Dress.—The robe and paletot are in stone-colored foulard, trimmed throughout with violet silk rutching. The only ornament on the skirt is a narrow flounce. Small straw bonnet, with a rose between two black velvets, is the tour-de-tête; violet silk bows and ends.

MASON & HAMLIN'S CABINET ORGANS.

HAVING taken some pains to satisfy ourselves respecting the merits of these new instruments, we are able to speak very confidently in regard to them, and to recommend them heartily to our readers. We have not found any difference in the opinions entertained of them by musicians; all value them highly, and all agree that their superiority to all other instruments of the class, American or foreign, is indisputable.—New York Examiner.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS.—The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person one week. This is not a new mode of dosing; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. Is it not better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctors' bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the strength and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds in one month, at the first trial. He continues its use as above directed, and finds it beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $3 per bottle (full quart). Sent free by express on receipt of price.

THE BEST PAPER FOR THE TIMES!

THE LEADING AND MOST POPULAR

AGRICULTURAL, LITERARY, AND FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

Will enter upon its Sixteenth Year and Volume in January next. It has for years been recognized as the best conducted Agricultural, Horticultural, Literary, and Family Weekly in the country, and the Publisher and Conducting Editor has resolved that the Volume for 1865 shall fully equal, if not excel, either of its predecessors in Interest, Style, and Attractive Under the heading of

It will contain a great variety of Practical and Scientific information on the Various Branches of Farm Husbandry, including the views and experiences of hundreds of able Contributors in all parts of the country, in Farm and County Fairs, Discussions, &c. It will also embrace a distinct Department devoted to

Conducted by the Hon. HENRY S. RANDALL, LL.D., author of "The Practical Shepherd," "Sheep Husbandry in the South," and other works. In this Department it is found to be the best authority on the subject in the country, and the department is worth much the price of the paper to any one engaged in Wool Growing or Sheep Breeding.

In this Department the RURAL will present the experience and observations of the best Horticulturists in America, including those of P. BARRY, ESQ., author of "The Fruit Garden," &c., and Editor of the Horticulturist, who is a regular contributor. Every one interested in the culture of Fruits or Flowers will find the RURAL indispensable.

The Ladies will find in the DOMESTIC ECONOMY Department many useful Recipes, with practical directions how to manage different matters pertaining to Housekeeping and Domestic Affairs.

Other Important Features!

But aside from the above important Practical Departments, the RURAL embraces others of vast interest. It includes in Its Plan a Live Department for the Farmers in those under the headings of LADIES' DEPARTMENT, CHOICE LITERATURE, THE HOME CIRCLE, YOUNG FOLKS, &c., as well as often as once in two weeks, EDUCATIONAL READING FOR THE YOUNG. Reviews of New Books, &c., &c., while the NEWS DEPARTMENT, MARKETS, &c., are ably and carefully conducted—rendering it, in every respect, a Complete Family NEWSPAPER in America.

Form, Style, Terms, &c.

THE RURAL is published in the magnificent FOLIO, DOUBLE QUARTO FORM (40 columns), and is published WEEKLY, in Superior Style—Good Paper, Clear Type, Illustrations, &c. An Index, Title Page, &c., at close of each Volume, complete for binding.

TERMS, IN ADVANCE—Only $3 a year. To Clubs and Agents—Five Copies for $14; Seven Copies for $19; Ten Copies for $25. ☞ Now is the Time to Subscribe and Form Clubs. Specimen Numbers, Show-Bills, &c., sent free on application. Address

BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

The Weak, the Consumptive, Rheumatic, Coutive, Bilious, and Dyspeptic, will derive some degree of benefit and increased strength and life pervade every organ of their frames.

Every dose makes the blood purer. The nerves commence to be strengthened and tremblers to cease. These pills, as a first effect, act upon the arterial blood, increasing the circulation, by which impurities are deposited in the veins, and they throw off such calculous matter as the bowels, which organs, by the energy derived from Brandreth's Pills, expel them from the system. When first used, the Pills may occasion griping, and even raise the patient feel worse. This is an excellent sign, and shows the disease will soon be cured. No great good is often achieved without some trouble in its attainment, and the rule applies to the recovery of health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. Sea upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

CONTENTS:

Important to Subscribers.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY will find upon the wrapper of each Number the date to which it is Accounted. The figures on the direction-label following the name show the Number with which the Subscription EXPIRES, as noted on our books. Every Subscriber may thus ascertain whether he has remitted in due season for his remittance, and also when to renew his Subscription. In cases of Subscriptions, Subscribers are particularly requested to name the NUMBER with which the New Subscription is to commence, as we shall thus avoid receiving duplicates, or missing any Number. It is desirable, as a General Rule, that, in case of a few weeks BEFORE the expiration of the former Subscription, no order for discontinuance or change be regarded unless paid. Attention to this will obviate nine-tenths of the errors which annoy both Publishers and Subscribers.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

In accordance with a special arrangement recently brought about for the mutual exchange of all the sick and invalid prisoners on either side, Colonel MULFORD, with fifteen transports laden with rebel prisoners, arrived at Fort Pulaski November 11. The number of rebel prisoners conveyed South in this first installment was 3200.—The transfer of these prisoners took place in the Savannah River, between Savannah and Fort Pulaski. The day after his arrival Capt. HATCH, the Confederate Commissioner, accompanied by the Richmond Ambulance Committee and a number of surgeons, left Savannah in the early morning, taking with him four transports, viz., the Beauregard, General Lee, Swan, and Ida.—The convalescents, numbering 1900, were first removed from our transports. Three hundred of the prisoners were very sick, and had suffered greatly on the voyage. Our prisoners subject to exchange under this arrangement were to be delivered on the 15th. The whole number to be exchanged is ten thousand, but there will be considerable delay in effecting the transfer, on account of the deficiency of the rebel means of transportation both by land and water. The rest of the rebel prisoners will be delivered at City Point, on the James River, this measure having been adopted for the comfort of those who are so ill that the voyage by sea might prove fatal.

In regard to the exchange the Times correspondent says: "The particularly striking feature of the scene, to my eye, was the grotesque appearance of the rebel steamers, especially the Swan and the General Lee. Both vessels are great slab-sided, flat-bottomed affairs, like unsightly houses washed from their foundations, having three rudders to guide them, on account of their lightness of draught. A spectator at a distance, without being blessed with a lively imagination, might have supposed these queer specimens of naval architecture to be floating hearses, the illusion being fostered by the funeral-like plumes of Cimmerian smoke which waved from their slender chimneys. But the crowds inside showed uproarious life, instead of death. A merrier set of invalids were never got together than those freed rebels who were crammed on board the steamers, and fringed the low guards of the vessels with dangling legs, almost dipping into the water through the hilarious carelessness of their owners. They went off up the river, yelling their peculiar mule-like cry which passes for a cheer, with their ill-omened flag waving over them, leaving the proud banner of freedom behind, the love of which, for a time, at least, they have madly rejected."

Little more than a week previous to MULFORD's arrival at Savannah the Island City had gone to that point to make the preliminary arrangements, and had delivered nearly 350 boxes for our prisoners, together with clothing and blankets to the value of $26,000. This was in accordance with the arrangements entered into by Generals GRANT and LEE, for the benefit both of Federal and Confederate prisoners.

MARTINSBURG.

MARTINSBURG, Virginia, of which town we give sketches on page 781, is the capital of Berkley County, and is situated on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. In 1850 this town had a population of over 2000 souls. Its situation has rendered it a peculiarly undesirable place of residence, and especially so during the last few months, when its streets have been trampled now by the rough riders of the Confederate cavalry, and then again by the Federal troops of SHERIDAN'S army. Before EARLY'S advance in the summer Martinsburg was an important military depôt. It is at present the depôt of General SHERIDAN'S army, and is under the military governorship of Brigadier-General SEWARD, son of the Secretary of State.

The principal sketch is a view of the square at the junction of King and Queen streets, the building with the tower being the Court-house, now used as the provost marshal's office. Opposite to it is a house belonging to Colonel HOGE, of the rebel army, occupied as head-quarters by General SEWARD. Every street is barricaded, so that the place is quite an incipient fortress, and secure against MOSBY'S and IMBODEN'S attacks. The ruins of the depôt buildings, and of houses burned in former attacks upon the town, give the usual air of desolation seen in border towns.

MARTINSBURG is several miles in the rear of General SHERIDAN'S army, and is situated about twenty miles northwest of Harper's Ferry.

THANKSGIVING.

THE feast of plenty comes once more,
The turkey, king of birds,
The beef, that bursts in every pore
With fatness of the herds,
And bulbous roots, white, golden, red,
And squaking jellies clear,
And lidless pies, with dotted eyes,
Crowd and complete the cheer.

The sun has kept its ripening glow,
The earth its yielding will,
The trees have not forgot to grow,
The yellow grain to fill;
The rain has fallen from the cloud,
The wind from the east,
The dew has shared, the blight has spared
Its force to crown the feast.

The grandsire takes the fireward seat,
The sire controls the cheer,
The mother rules below where sweet
The little ones are near;*
And the tall grandson sits between,
Close to his manhood's prize,
Whose spirit seems to float in dreams
Drawn from the children's eyes.

The white head bends: "We thank Thee, Lord,
For life, and plenty, boon,
For strength that shall sheathe the sword
In peace and union soon;
Sustain the poor, the weak, oppressed,
The broken-hearted heal,
And shower all very man's cause for praise
To Thee, O Lord, reveal!"

Then passes round the flaky breast,
The wish-bone is a prize,
The drumstick rattles out a jest,
With wings the laughter flies;
The mottled beef has stanchest friends
Whom mustard makes not sad,
The gravies run for very fun
Down white-bibbed bosoms glad.

The juicy plums are slyly sought
To help the failing taste;
With double-kerneled nuts are bought
The gifts of thoughtless haste;
The talk subsides, they pledge the day
In glass of home-brewed cheer,
The feast is done, the happiest one
Of all the thankful year.

O Father! hear the grandsire's prayer,
And shed from heaven above,
Round feasts that have a vacant chair,
The mercy of Thy love;
And if the form that filled it once
Be hid 'neath battle-field,
Throw wide the door to thankful eyes,
And bid it be revealed.

PEACE.

THE air is full of rumors of peace. It has been so at intervals from the beginning, and will be so to the end of the war. Nothing was more natural than that after the election the blowers of rumors should take out their longest pipes and blow the largest and most glittering of bubbles. Nothing also was truer than General BUTLER'S remark that, having ascertained how unanimous the country is for war if necessary, it is a good time to ascertain whether it be necessary. It is a good time, because there can be no possible misunderstanding. An invitation to the rebels to lay down their arms could not be misinterpreted now, as it might have been at any other time in the war, as a sign of failure upon the part of the Government. It would be the indication of conscious power and conscious right. It would be the summons to a doomed fortress to surrender after the irresistible strength of the besiegers had been displayed to the garrison in full view.

The experience of his administration teaches us that we may trust the President to do the right thing in this matter at the right time and in the right way. In whatever he does he will neither compromise the authority of the people nor acknowledge any shadow of right in the theory or fact of rebellion. Neither will he do any thing impatiently or passionately. There is nothing finer in his whole career than his passionless but unswerving patriotism. There has been no self-seeking, and a sagacious independence in all his actions. He has not hesitated to alienate at times all parties of his immediate adherents, whenever his sense of duty demanded it, secure always of the permanent approval of the people. Our history does not furnish his master as a statesman.

It is probable that in his Message there will be a frank expression of his views upon the present aspect of the rebellion, and very possibly a direct appeal to the insurgent section of the country, bidding the rebels to ponder the significance of the election; to look with their own eyes, not through the illusive words of their leaders, at the actual condition and prospect of the rebellion, assuring them that their loyal fellow-citizens have but one wish, and that is to live peaceably with them under a common Government, and but one determination—that they will do so.

The conditions of peace are to-day what they have always been. They are the same for every man and party in every part of the country. They are submission to the laws and acts in pursuance of the Constitution. If any citizen doubts whether the Confiscation act or the Emancipation proclamation are Constitutional, the President has already referred the question to the Supreme Court. As to "terms" in regard to the rebel leaders, the American people will undoubtedly require that, at the least, they shall be forever ineligible as citizens.

Of course the Government of the people must determine when it is satisfied that any State has resumed its proper relations to the Union. It can not be enough that the State says so. It can not be enough that it goes through the forms of an election. The Government will, of necessity, hold every part of the rebel section which it recovers until it is perfectly assured that the national peace would not be endangered by relinquishing it. In insurgent States, for instance, claimed to secede in their sovereign capacity. If in their sovereign capacity they return, the United States Government will naturally inquire whether, in their sovereign capacity, under any pretense whatever, they propose to secede again. So long as the majority of citizens in any State holds to the doctrine of supreme State sovereignty, the peace of the Union is as much threatened by it as Pennsylvania was by Lucy Ann Cobb. In the future of the United States be withdrawn from a State which claims the right of secession at will? And can the existence of such a majority be determined except by a fair vote upon a constitutional amendment, expressly affirming the indestructibility of the Union?

We shall, however, be spared the present solution of such questions, because whatever the action of our Government in regard to peace, the attitude of the rebels will be unchanged. While they have any effective military force they will bear only of war. When that force is broken, the anarchy into which the rebel section must surely fall will make the presence of the United States arms a necessity until society can be reconstructed. It is useless, says the President, to jump before you look. He stands. Be ready to leap when you are there. Great questions of policy which perplex us in advance are very apt to present themselves finally in a practicable form. All that we need is to keep certain controlling principles clearly in mind, and as fast as they appear apply them to them. Conscious of wishing for honorable peace, and taught by our experience and by reason upon what terms peace can be permanent, we may tranquilly await the opportunity which the rebels alone can furnish.

RAILROAD TRAVEL.

THE whole system of railroad travel in this country is disgraceful; and we propose, in this and subsequent articles, to show what it is and what it might be improved. We do not rely upon any appeal to the managers of the roads. They may be privately very reasonable gentlemen, but as a body they certainly feel no adequate public responsibility as conveyers of passengers; and we look therefore to the people themselves in the Legislatures to apply the needful remedies.

It is understood that the Central Railroad Company's charter will be up for renewal in a coming to Albany during the next session of the Legislature to ask leave to raise the rates of fare. If it comes, it will come, we are prepared to carry its point by the usual means. But we hope there will be good sense and courage enough among the legislators to make the grant of power contingent upon the abandonment of abuses. That was the way the English people two and three hundred years ago used to treat their kings, and there is no reason why we should be less strict with ours.

There is one good example to this very point. During the last session, we believe, the Central Road applied for some fresh privilege, which was granted. But some thirsty statesman, who may have suffered upon an express train from the want of an omnibus conductor, or, in default, secured the insertion of a clause in the bill that in every car of every train there should be a jar of ice-water, under a penalty of fifty dollars—is that the suit against the Company might be brought in any county of the State. How the royal board of managers must have chuckled! For they knew, sagacious souls, that the American citizen would go forever parched and panting in the burning sands of the south, from Albany and Buffalo, and die of thirst rather than enter a complaint.

And here is the difficulty in reforming the abuses of railroad travel, and all other, that the people themselves are so pusillanimous. If an omnibus is intended to carry twelve, and a thirteenth man unfairly and selfishly presents himself at the door, there is seldom one of the twelve who dares insist upon the rights of the passengers, and they all conspire to put a premium upon selfishness by suffering to put the interloper to crowd in. Now it is very clear that if the passengers do not insist upon the rule the proprietors will not. ROSS BROWNE somewhere says that when he was one of nine guests stowed into one bed together at a Western inn the landlord brought a tenth, and when BROWNE plaintively pleaded that they were tolerably full he was sternly denounced by the host as a haughty and unsocial being. By this time, doubtless, that host is the model president or superintendent of a grand central railroad, offering every inducement for enlightened travelers to prefer it to all other tedious, dangerous, and connection-missing routes.

There surely is nothing surly in insisting upon obvious rights; and it is only fair that the Legislatures should try to help people help themselves in the matter of comfort and safety in travel.

The general railway massacre that is taking place in the country is certainly the business of somebody; and of whom can it be so much the interest as the public themselves? The travel was never so great; the trains never so full; and every body departs upon his journey with a vague fear that it may be his last. It is true, as we said two or three weeks ago, that the proportion of lives lost to the whole number of travelers is not large. But when it could and ought to be smaller, there is no reason for suggesting that it might be larger. Indeed it is very rapidly becoming larger; and the loss of life upon our railroads during the last twelvemonth is very much greater than in any recent year. Last week, upon the old line of the Central Railroad, near Auburn, the mail passenger train, thundering around a curve at the rate of forty miles an hour, encountered a freight train rushing toward it upon the same track. The collision was frightful. The locomotive was driven upon and, and every seat in the passenger cars was torn up, and scarcely a passenger escaped without injury, while the engineer was killed.

Now, for such a deplorable event somebody is to blame. It is said that the guilty person in this instance is the engineer of the freight train, who ran out of time. But every engineer on the Central Road knew that if he ran out of time, under any excuse whatever, he would infallibly lose his place. To be disgraced, whether any disaster followed or not, there would be no running out of time, and the slaughter that we have described would not have occurred. The probability is that the engineer of the freight train has before run out of his time, and has not been rebuked. The penalty of running out of time, if no accident ensues, should be as severe as it can lawfully be made. The punishment of so doing, when loss of life results, should be that of murder.

When the Central Road appears at the bar of the House we hope New York will make a beginning in providing for the safety and comfort of the public. Next week we shall resume the subject with some practical suggestions.

THE END OF REBEL LOGIC.

THE inevitable question of the rebellion at length openly confronts the rebels. What shall be done with it, they ask? Shall they be sent into the field to fight for the "Confederacy," or shall they be kept to digging? and if they fight shall they be free?

The whole logic of the Southern system has broken down. The Southern leaders have insisted for many a year that the "peculiar institution" was also that of Christ and their Northern allies have lustily echoed the great and refreshing truth that, Canaan having been cursed, every color but white was cursed by divine beneficence to be sold like a sucking pig.

We have been listening now for many years to the noble doctrine that the system of slavery on our Southern shore was God's appointment for the African race, and for all admixture of the European and American races with the African; that to question its benefit or beauty was to blaspheme God and his laws, and to presume to be wiser than the heavenly intelligence. Not this alone. They said that the system divine, for the slaves were happier than any peasantry in the world. They were comfortably cared for in sickness and age. They had no anxieties, no responsibilities. They danced to the banjo under the peaceful palmetto, and, if we only knew it, the name of happiness was Slavery in the Southern States. Gentlemen from Georgia and went from plantation to plantation and found the life idyllic. Dainty ladies went from New York to pass the winter under planting friends, and returned with the rosiest romances of the felicity of Dinah and Sambo in their cunning little cabins. Every thing was lovely in the world except the dark and dreadful theory of the right of every man to himself and his own labor. Every body who did not own slaves was tolerable if he only owned land he owned some. But whoever dehounced Slavery as a wrong to human nature, and an inevitable peril to the country, he was an awful monster in human form, he was the opposite of "a gentleman"—he was an abolitionist.

To defend and perpetuate the divine institution it was made the head of the corner of the new nation of "the South." We were to see beyond all evil that the only security of Liberty was slavery, the only foundation of Democracy was despotism, the only Right was Wrong. Unhappily, in the process of proving it, it became pretty clear that the proof will fall unless the slaves are summoned to the field. But they must be stimulated to fight, and the inspiration is to be the "boon of freedom." In other words, the structure can not be raised without knocking away the corner-stone! And the whole ghastly lie from which this infamous rebellion springs stands revealed.

The rebels propose to free the slaves if they will fight. But what "boon" can freedom be to Sambo and Dinah, who are so delightfully content in the cunning calico? The rebellion is to preserve the cabin. Why then hope to stimulate the happy peasants to fight by promising them that the system for whose protection they are to take arms, and which secures their happiness, is to be destroyed as their reward? Logic requires the negroes and the rebel leaders to say, "Here, boys! God, you know, made you to be slaves, and we are fighting to keep you so. But the fight is a little hard. We are not altogether successful. So just turn to, take a brisk part in the fight for the perpetuity of slavery; and as you are all so happy and contented, and as it is the intention of Providence that you shall be slaves, we promise you if you will only fight bravely you shall be more slaves than ever. We will not fly in the face of Providence. Where you have had only one child sold you shall have all your children put up on the block; and where you have been peddled and pickled between the distillery and you shall be whaled over the whole back. Fall in, boys; and strike home against the enemies who wish to oppose God and us!"

If Slavery be, as the rebels and their Northern friends have so persistently assured us, the best and happiest possible disposition of the negro, why do DAVIS and his associates presume to outrage Christianity and thwart the divine purpose by promising the negro his liberty, if he will fight? He generally pursues rewards not penalties to those whom we wish to win.

The whole debate, the proposition to give the slave the right to fight the "boon of freedom," shows that the rebels know, with all the rest of mankind, that their system is inhuman and inhuman. When they wish to make the slave a man they promise him his liberty, because they know that liberty is his birthright, and that they have deprived him of it. Out of their own mouth is their condemnation. The whole section is the justification of every American citizen who has contended that, as Slavery was a fatal and increasing wrong, it was the necessary foe of national peace.

The rebel brethren are not harmonious upon the question. Some of them have pronounced out the absurd inconsistency of implying that Slavery can be wrong. But the official language of DAVIS is enough. If they intend to continue the war, they must arm the slaves. They know, as we do, that the slaves perfectly understand the war. They know, as we do, that if they are armed, they will have their liberty. They make, therefore, a grace of necessity; and in the hopeless effort to save a point of shallow pride they renounce the grand object of their rebellion, and by their own act give the victory to the nation and civilization.

THE POSITION OF NEW YORK.

IN his speech at the Astor House the other evening the Governor elect, Mr. FENTON, said: "With your counsel and co-operation, and with the counsel and co-operation of the loyal people throughout the State (which I hope embraces the large mass of all the citizens), I expect that New York hereafter shall occupy no hesitating or equivocal position."

To the present every faithful citizen will say, Amen! For the State of New York has too long been a base of disloyal sympathy, and so long as the present Governor was in office no reason could be found a right-minded man why might "turn up" to their advantage.

The reason of this confidence upon their part was that Governor SEYMOUR was not only the state sovereignty school, which is the excuse of the rebellion. Whoever has carefully read and considered his speeches very soon sees that under studied apology for the rebellion, their unconcealed sympathy for the rebels, and steady hostility to the national cause are the result of the fiercest of party-spirit, which is made ludicrous by the attempt to make it appear calm and impartial, and of an admission to the fatal absurdity of any sovereignty, which makes the Union impossible.

Descended from New England ancestry, Governor SEYMOUR manifested the hatred of New England. Incessantly dubbed statesman by a clique of his party, he has administered the Government of the State of New York for many years in such a way as to excite the hopes of every domestic rebel and foreign enemy of the country; and his defeat, no less than the election of Mr. LINCOLN, will be accepted by Europe as an expression of the fixed resolution of the American people to make no terms with rebellion. Two years ago, upon his accession to office, his first message was looked for in Europe with scarcely less interest than that of the President; for he was regarded as the Magnus Apollo of the peace party which was to humble the United States by submission to separation or to rebel terms of Union. It was a disappointment to his friends and to our enemies that he did not recall the New York troops from the army; and from that moment down to the election the complaint of his friends has been that he had not the courage of his convictions.

Yet it might have satisfied them that he has incessantly thwarted the National Government whenever and wherever he could. He has complained of the drafts; he has incited riots; he has betrayed ill-feeling upon every occasion, as in his recent Fredericksburg fast Thanksgiving; he has never avowed a single spark of sympathy for his country and her trials, but has perpetually bewailed the loss of life and money, as if no cause were good enough to be worth a sacrifice. In his Chicago speech he was guilty of the most flagrant misrepresentation of history, and betrayed the most total misconception of the character and purpose of the people, and by the late election he has been doubly rebuked.

Yet it was not enough. He has abandoned his "friends" by not trying openly to array the State of New York against the National Government, as he has alienated all faithful citizens by evidently wishing to do it. His own party were indignant with him for what they called juggling himself into the nomination—and he fails, baffled, without a single patriotic or generous act to mark his administration, without the sympathy of his friends, and with the hearty contempt of his opponents.

As he disappears from the scene how refreshing to hear from the lips of his successor, the President of the Soldiers' Relief Commission, that New York shall hereafter occupy no hesitating or equivocal position. The motto of the Empire State is Excelsior—higher! And excelsior shall always be its patriotism, intelligence, and humanity!

THANKSGIVING

THE American people have this year such reason as they never had before to give humble and hearty thanks to God and to Man; and all the signs depicted in the striking picture we publish to-day the various aspects of the festival.

First of all by a singular unanimity the people have resolved that the authority of their Government and the order of civil society shall be maintained, and have expressed their will by the reelection of the President whose name is identified with the cause of the Union and the perpetuity of the American principle.

They have proclaimed their unshaken reliance upon the intelligence and savvy of their fellow-men, the practical vindicators of the national honor and authority.

They render their gratitude for the great and necessary Peace Commissioners who lead the army and the navy, and whose names are to be honored for their patriotism than historical for their consummate ability. GRANT and FARRAGUT, SHERMAN and PORTER, SHERIDAN and THOMAS, and the illustrious brethren, will be honorably and gratefully remembered so long as we are a nation.

They thank God that the great State of Maryland, torn by civil war, has deliberately renounced the system from which all our woes have sprung, and has led the march of the Slave States in the path of equal liberty and justice, the way of permanent peace.

They thank God for the patriotic devotion of the hearts that the war has broken, and which, in the depths of their misery, are still grateful that there were made the parents and wives and sisters and lovers and brothers of heroes, and not of cowards—heroes whose memory shall not die while human hearts beat or the flag of the nation floats.

They thank God that the defeat of rebels and the consternation of foreign foes foretell the triumph from which peace and prosperity shall flow.

But in foolish pride, not in hot confidence of sudden victory, but in the calm consciousness of a holy and impregnable purpose, the people of the United States, counting the cost, faithful to their trust, true to the living, will celebrate their Thanksgiving with sober and religious hearts.

THE BIRD OF AMERICA.

THEOPHILACTILY it is the eagle; but it is the turkey that excites the eagle to fly. There has been no pleasanter incident than the heartiness with which the suggestion of a Thanksgiving dinner for the army and navy has been received. Every body has contributed: that the soldiers and sailors may have practical proof of the potato and sweet-potatoes without the turkey and the chicken fixin's.

Our artist, Mr. HOSMER, has seized the spirit of the scene as it will be witnessed along the coast. The boys will not stand upon the order of their eating, but will eat at once. And they may be sure that in a thousand homes they will be

"In our dewlap cups freshly remembered," and cheered with three times three. The universal Thanksgiving turkey shall be seasoned with many a tale of heroism, and the cheerful feeling of the old festival bird us as warmly and closely together as the whole family of the Union will by the possession of the camp and the ship, be one day bound.

PETROLEUM.

OUR readers will find elsewhere an advertisement of the New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company. DANIEL S. DICKINSON is the President, and he is associated with gentlemen of experience in the business. A careful study of the prospectus will reveal the advantages of the investment. The discovery of petroleum is so recent, and the necessary demand so large and increasing, that this company may be said to proceed upon a permanent basis. Their prospectus speaks frankly and fairly; and the name of MR. DICKINSON, who has, we believe, for the first time associated his name in the enterprise, should satisfy the inquirer that it is not a mere speculation.

POMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MILITARY SITUATION.

THE popular interest in General Sherman's new campaign is of the most shorting kind. An ordinary victory, or even a considerable success, is sufficient to divert the attention even for a moment from the grand topic. If Savannah is recaptured, one of the most formidable of the rebel iron-clads is blown up by a torpedo, and the waters of an entire coast made as unpleasant as undisputed Federal possession; another vessel, more to be feared than either which has been secured our commerce, is taken directly under the guns of a friendly Power; General Gillmore gains a victory and suffers a repulse; ten thousand of our suffering soldiers are released from the hell known by the Southern gentlemen as prisons; yet these events fore but episodes, or interludes, in the great military drama. The whole country has prepared itself to be vexed, maintained, in spite of all these incidents, fevered, like an orchestra, by the call to the popular expectation. Even the Armies of the Potomac and the James would be the waiver of an entire brand made in consequence of undisputed Federal possession; another vessel, more to be feared than either which has

CAPTURE OF THE BLOCKADE RUNNER "ANNIE," OCTOBER 31, 1864.—[SKETCHED BY CHARLES F. ELLMORE.]

THE LATE MR. JOHN LEECH.

JOHN LEECH, celebrated as the best humorous draughtsman of Punch, died on the 29th of October, at the age of forty-seven. The record of his life is short and simple. He was born in London in 1817, and was educated at the Charter-house. His first efforts as an artist appeared in Bell's Life in London, with which he was connected for two years. Among these early works the best was a series of sketches of the droller aspects of Parisian life. His first sketch in Punch, entitled "Foreign Affairs," appeared in 1841, and from that date to his death he has contributed almost every week to its pages. These weekly sketches, with etchings in Bentley's Miscellany, a few illustrations of works of fiction, and a yearly installment of Christmas Sketches, have reflected to the world the graceful thought and humor of this wonderful artist for more than twenty years. His sketches of English social life—his pictures of balls, dinner-parties, mess-rooms, bachelors' chambers, Rotten-row, gardens, parks, streets, watering-places, shooting parties, hunting-fields, boating, fishing, and we know not what else, make up such a history of his time as to the future historian will be invaluable.

MR. LEECH was a careful, patient workman; and there is no doubt that his incessant brain-work exhausted too far his nervous organization, which was as delicate as his fancy was exquisite and refined. Toward the last of his life he suffered greatly from sleeplessness. He was much affected by mine, and was literally driven from his house in Brunswick Square to Kensington by street music. Less than a year ago he stood by the grave of THACKERAY, his school-fellow and friend, overcome with uncontrollable grief. Now he himself has been called, and the news of his departure will quench the Christmas mirth of thousands of loving friends.

THE BLOCKADE OFF WILMINGTON.

WE illustrate on this page the capture of the blockade-runner Annie, October 31, off Wilmington, by the launch of the United States steamer Alabama. This launch, mounting a 12-pound rifled howitzer, was doing picket-duty off the bar at New Inlet, one of the two entrances to Wilmington. About half past seven, on the night of the 31st, a steamer was seen coming out, and heading directly for the launch. Fire was immediately opened on this vessel, the second shot taking effect in her port-quarter, when the gun-boats Wilderness and Nipbon gave chase, and soon signaled back to the launch that the vessel was captured. The prize proved to be the Annie, laden with 550 bales of cotton and 40 tons of tobacco, and having on board a crew of about 60 persons. This is the first vessel ever captured under the guns of Fort Fisher. The launch which effected this capture is the only vessel of the kind in the fleet.

We give also on page 772 two illustrations representing the two inlets to Wilmington harbor, and our blockading fleets at each of these inlets. The rebels have lately been extending their fortifications along the coast, placing a battery at every available point. The Cape Fear River has also been filled with obstructions. The approaches to Fort Fisher, the most formidable of the defensive works, are protected by heavy shore batteries.

THANKSGIVING PUMPKIN.

"HAVE you nice pumpkins?" asked Mary Perham—whose character I shall not be able to portray very distinctly in the space of a short story, but whom I commend, dear reader, to your kind regards as a nice, good girl—of a fat boy with yellow hair and white eyebrows, who stood behind the counter of a provision store.

It was the seventh time she had asked the question in the course of forty-five minutes by a fast watch. She had traversed almost the entire length of the street, stopping at every provision store on her way, but without finding a pumpkin to suit her. One was too large, another too small; one too ripe, another not ripe enough; while the rest were too dear for poor Mary's slender purse. To be candid, I must say that it is not decided opinion that Mary Perham in the forty-five minutes had turned over and examined more than one pumpkin which would have satisfied the majority of people. I don't like to say it, but I am afraid that Mary was fastidious about Thanksgiving pumpkins. She had been educated in the New England faith, that there could be no Thanksgiving dinner without the best pumpkin pies. She lived with her brother—a typesetter by profession—and kept a small, very small day-school. Together the brother and sister had determined upon having a Thanksgiving dinner; the brother was to purchase the turkey, while Mary was to provide the pumpkin-pies, made after her mother's own receipt; and this was the reason why she had asked for the eleventh time, "Have you nice pumpkins?"

To this question—the eleventh time propounded—the boy with the yellow hair and white eyebrows replied with a familiar, swaggering tone and manner,

"Only one left! They've gone like hot cakes to-day—Thanksgiving, you know."

"Is that a nice one?" asked Mary.

"Couldn't say—not much uv er judge of punkins, 'cause I've never been in a store in punkin time, you know. Am of water-melons, though; know a good water-melon by the way it rips open on it; don't have to thump it, nur turn it over, nothing, except to look at it right sharp. However, I shouldn't say this punkin was any thing uncommon," he continued, lifting the golden fruit and revolving it under her eyes; "not that I know any thing against it, but it's been picked over so often, you know."

Mary "guessed" she would look further, and stepped into the street. Entering a provision store a few doors below, she again asked, "Have you nice pumpkins?" The person interrogated was a wide-awake, pallid French Canadian. Every storewriter made his French character reply with a bow and a smile. It should like to give you something original in my Frenchman. I should like, if I could, to represent him as gruff, or as a compressed-lipped hero. But since I prefer truth to originality, I must say that he replied in Mary Perkins's question with a very low bow, and a smile most bland.

"Oui, Madame—we have one fresh supply jus from de country."

"Are they sweet?"

"Jus as sweet as sunney."

"Are they tender?"

"Juice tender as a baby."

"Are they fully ripe?"

"Madame, dey are de finest in de market."

Selecting one without directing it to be sent to a certain number on a certain street, Mary faced about, and commenced retracing her steps. It was rapidly growing dark, and as she passed up the street the shops began to burst into light. More than once Mary slackened her pace as she passed a show window to admire the beautiful silks there streaming like banners. She paused before a brilliantly-lighted shop, running back to such a distance that the large mirror at the farther end seemed to her scarcely broader than the little cracked glass which hung on the wall in her poor home, before which she dressed her hair in the morning. The clerks were hurrying to and fro with an eager, business-like air. Many ladies were coming and going. Among the hurrying forms Mary's eyes sought one loved and familiar. I need not say that this form was not a woman's, she why does she stand in the shadow there, with her veil half drawn over her face, trembling and frightened? Why else does her cheek glow with shame? Poor Mary! You feel like a guilty thing in thus seeking a man who has never asked to be loved you. But let me prop a word in your ear, if you can spare me your attention for a moment: Any woman is emnobled by true love, however bestowed. Her unasked-for love is the rose-tree without the rose; it is the dead egg among the cliffs; but quickened by love, it is the eagle soaring to the clouds. Your heart is greater and grander thing now than ever before. Love is the gift of the thought, and never again blush because you love. Let her blush, or weep rather, whose nature is too hard or too light for loving. Next to loving God, the best thing for a woman is to love a noble man.

If I was sitting, dear reader, looking into your eyes, and telling my story by word of mouth, I can fancy that we might hold something like the following conversation:

"But whom was Mary Perkins—this keeper of a small day-school, and sister of a typo-setter—whom was she seeking in that brilliant shop? One of the clerks, in a way of a few hundred dollars?" you ask.

"No," I reply, with a significant smile.

"The book-keeper?"

"No."

"The head clerk?"

"Guess again."

"The junior partner?"

Then with a can-you-believe-it air I communicate the astounding intelligence that it was Mr. Lehman, the sole proprietor of that fine establishment —one of the merchant princes of the city.

"But what right," you ask, "had Mary Perkins to know and love Mr. Lehman?"

Then I should tell you the following story: Some five years before we had Mary Perkins, blushing and trembling, standing outside this brilliant store on a Thanksgiving eve, a lad, just turned eighteen, had left New York to seek his fortune in California. On board the same vessel, and bound for the same point, was embarked a rising merchant of the city, with the design of establishing a branch of his business in the growing city of San Francisco. Scarcely had the vessel put to sea before the merchant was attacked by a fever, which confined him to his berth during the entire voyage. The lad abovementioned watched by the side of the sick man even after they had reached San Francisco.

Having transacted his business the merchant returned to his home after recovering the young friend who had tended him of his undying gratitude, and begging the privilege of being permitted to serve him for nearly two years the young man likewise returned to the city without, it is needless to add, the fortune he had gone to seek. The merchant, learning this, sought out his quondam nurse. The young man, prouder than wise, perhaps, refused all aid except the merchant's influence in procuring him a situation as printer in a prominent publishing-house.

The merchant had been in the habit, for more than a year, of calling occasionally upon Mary to see his young friend; and thus it was that Mary Perkins learned to love the bachelor merchant more than her brother or herself.

Had Mary Perkins known any other man than Mr. Lehman, under whose roof she was living, whether that evening standing eager but ashamed at his shop-door. Had she been acquainted with Mr. Lehman's antecedents, she might have been chosen to pass her life with any one of them, on a few hundred dollars a year, rather than with the proprietor in a form of love which we must now love, and if her acquaintance is confined to one man, she will so surely love him as that he is not utterly unworthy.

Then it was for the merchant's short, broad figure that Mary was seeking. But in vain she sought—in vain she looked, and looked again. Some slight disappointment swelled in her bosom, as though a hand had been laid suddenly upon her heart. She assured herself that he was not in the store. Having satisfied herself of this, an irresistible inclination possessed her to enter and look for a moment. Mary walked—a place to which her thoughts would often wander as some stupid, dirty boy stood by her side in the little shop, and was carefully picking out his reading lesson—a place to her invested with romance haunted by his presence. She had never in her life entered a store as a customer. She had always avoided passing it lest she might seem to seek Mr. Lehman. Yet how the poor girl yearned to know how he looked in his business hours, and how he seemed there.

I have said that Mary felt an irresistible inclination to enter the establishment; this being the case, of course she entered. No sooner had she done so than a smart clerk hurried over to her, demanding what she wished to look at. Mary remembered that she had but a three-cent piece—this was before all the specie had been driven out of circulation—and a couple of pennies in her purse; she couldn't buy any thing; she might as well see the best the establishment—so she answered, "Nothing." Perceiving the directions of the clerk, she found herself traversing the long building, with her image advancing to meet her.

"I wish to look at silks," she said to the clerk who hastened to intercept her.

One rich pattern after another was taken from the small, stiff paper which enfolded it, and decorously gathered together. Mary looked at it, and shifted it now in this light, then in that, until Mary forgot Mr. Lehman and every thing else in the magnificent whirl soon to be with stinging sharpness—it is hard to be poor.

Then she asked to see cotton and sleeves, and immediately one box after another of the articles laces was opened before her. Mary heard ladies on the other counters ask for the same things, while others counted out sums for laces which would have made her comfortable for years.

Having once had the wished, and having worked her mind up to its maximum of discontent, she was hurrying from the store, when she met Mr. Lehman's eye fixed upon her. Mary's heart, which had agonized amidst such splendor in her poor dress, Mary rushed into the street. Night had now fairly set in, and the gas-lighter in the opposite corner building a wall of flame along the street. Mary walked away rapidly, for she was excited. There was a strange mixture of bitterness and bitterness in her heart. As she hurried on she was knocked and pushed aside, and almost ran over by a boy, who, to her that every one felt that he had a right to crowd and jostle such a nobody. It seemed that she was nothing to any one in the great world—as she thought of him among busy workers, seemed lost to her.

After some moments of rapid walking she reached her home. It looked bleak and comfortless. She entered; it was dark, for her brother had not yet returned; and cold as a vault. She had had all died out during her search for the pumpkin. She groped about in the dark, stumbling over chairs and tables, and lighted a miserable tallow-candle. Scarcely had she done this before the door-bell rang, and the pumpkin was borne into the kitchen. Laying aside her bonnet and shawl she went to work to make the pumpkin-pies; but I must say she was not a cheerful worker. She sang no merry songs, and cut it into little square chips she indulged in repining—I am sorry to expose my heroine's weakness. She repeated to herself some dismal poetry —lines from "The Song of the Shirt," from "The Bridge of Sighs," and from "The Song of the Children."

"The idea of my keeping Thanksgiving"! thought Mary. "Why should I be thankful? Because I love a man who is a thousand leagues removed from me? Because, while there is gayety and luxury here, I am doing the work of a slave for my living? Because every taste of my nature must be crushed into the earth that I may get bread?" (Spitefully.) "I will not try to have a Thanksgiving dinner." (Pathetically.) "I have no heart to make pumpkin-pies. I shall spend tomorrow as any other day, and on Monday go back to my drudgery. My life is to pass in a treadmill, and it avails nothing to step off the wheel for one day."

With this Mary Perkins sat down on a hard kitchen chair, with her sleeves rolled above her elbows, her knees slightly contracted, while in her eyes was a half yearning, half angry expression. She was unconscious of the passage of time, and was aroused from her reverie by the ringing of the door-bell directly above her head. Going to the door, a large bundle was handed to her by a small boy, who instantly ran down the steps and was gone. Very much wondering, Mary opened the bundle. The first thing which met her view was a handsome blue silk, which an hour before she had admired at Mr. Lehman's. On opening the box she found a delicate handkerchief, and the very collar and sleeves which she would have selected from the lot shown her an hour before.

Mary's first emotion was one of almost childish delight and admiration over the exquisite goods. Then she fancied herself arrayed in these new and beautiful garments. It was a fair picture that rose before her as she sat dreamily gazing at the parcel. It was that of a young girl with a face pale and somewhat sad, but fair and delicate, eyes like an Italian skies, and rich Saxon hair combed away from her forehead, and modestly brow. Then she stood in a closely fitting silk of azureline blue, closed at the white throat, around which ran a small lace ruffle; the flowing sleeves, slashed to the shoulder, fell back from the arm, revealing full lace sleeves with dainty little cuffs to match the collar.

Mary for once in existence was lost in admiration of her metamorphosed self. Even Mr. Lehman, she thought, must yield his admiration could he see her dressed in these rich and costly fabrics. But would he not despise a beauty which she had accepted at the hands?

Mary was not long in making her decision. Hastily tying up the bundle, she threw on her bonnet and shawl, locked the house and hurried off to Mr. Lehman's store, forgetful of her pumpkin which she left simmering over the fire.

Mary's eyes were bright and lightened as she stepped from the car which had stopped in front of Mr. Lehman's store. How she dreaded entering that brilliant shop with her bundle! How she shrank from meeting him! She had half a mind to go directly home with the bundle; then she found relief in the thought that she could leave it without seeing Mr. Lehman. But then such a course would seem so ungrateful. Then, she was but one thing to be done; see Mr. Lehman, thank him for remembering her, and tell him how impossible it was to accept his present. Hesitating and trembling she entered the store.

"I wish to see Mr. Lehman," she said to the clerk who met her.

"He is very much engaged, and can not be interrupted, ma'am."

"I must see him," said Mary, very earnestly.

"If you will give me your name I will speak to him, though I am afraid it will be useless," said the clerk.

"Mary Perkins," she reluctantly said, and he hurried off directly to Mr. Lehman's desk, and saw the latter start up as he received the clerk's message. Mary leaned heavily against the counter, and her head swam as she saw the merchant approaching. Her impulse was to run away and leave the bundle. In a moment he stood beside her looking gravely down upon her.

"Well, Mary, what is it?"

"I have brought—" Oh, Mr. Lehman, I am not ungrateful—you are very kind—they are beautiful—but I have brought them back, Sir. I can't accept any thing from one who is so indifferent —I mean one who is such a stranger—one upon whom I have so little claim, I mean, Sir—"

"You have a claim, Mary, and I'm a stranger!" said Mr. Lehman, bluntly; "then who, pray, are your intimate acquaintances? Who are your friends? Who do you call your home once a week? Who loves your brother better than I do? Who has a better right to do you a kindness?"

"Oh, Sir, I am grateful. I know you are say—my best friend. You are almost my only acquaintance. You are very kind—but I can not accept any thing from you. Please to take them away. And now I must go home. Good-by, Sir, I shall be very grateful for your kindness."

Mr. Lehman followed her; at the door he caught her arm rather rudely, saying, "Wait and take a cab, Mary."

They stood there in silence while the car came up. Mr. Lehman assisted Mary in, and, much to her surprise, took a seat beside her. Neither spoke during the ride to her home.

"Good-night!" said Mary, as she stood on her door-step.

"Humph! hospitable! Can't you say, Come in?"

"Excuse me, but I did not suppose you would like to. Will you come in?"

"Yes."

Mary would have been much better pleased had his answer been no, but she nevertheless opened the door and invited him to enter. When he had stepped into the hall she was at a great loss as to the disposition she should make of him, for the house was as dark as Erebus.

"If you will come into this room and take a seat I will bring a light," said Mary, awkwardly.

"What room?"

"This one," she answered, pointing to a very small parlor, which was a very silly thing for her to do, for how could she expect Mr. Lehman to perceive the bearing of her finger amidst such profound darkness?

"Here, give me your hand and lead me to a seat before I break my neck in this darkness. Where is your hand? Ah, there it is," extending his arm and feeling around him, as though he would have done in playing at blind-man's-buff.

"Here it is," said Mary, timidly, guiding herself by his voice, for she saw nothing.

After some little groping about on the parts of both, accompanied by exclamations, impatient on his side and apologetic on hers, their hands found each other. His fingers closed around hers with an energy which made Mary feel that he must be irritated.

Now, whether or not Mr. Lehman had sought her hand for the express purpose of keeping her near him while he said, "Mary, I love you," or whether he was surprised into a declaration by his strange position, I have never had the means of ascertaining, as Mr. Lehman has always persistently refused to enlighten me on the subject, and I know of no one else who can.

I do know, however—enough to satisfy all reasonable curiosity—that he very abruptly pronounced the words, "Mary, I love you" so fast did the word like a captured bird, and that: he rather peremptorily demanded if she loved him; and that before she could reply she heard her brother as he turned his key in the front door; that she ran into the kitchen for a light, and that there, by a faint glimmer given out from the dying fire, she discovered a column of smoke ascending from her kettle of pumpkin, while the room was filled with the odor of the burning article.

It would be a very nice termination to my story could I say that Mary Perkins was married the next morning, and that she took her Thanksgiving dinner with her husband, in her own house. It was not Mr. Lehman's fault that my story can not be so pleasant and appropriate a termination. For reasons of which I am ignorant—I guess they had some connection with her wardrobe—Mary persistently refused to be married within five weeks.

Her Thanksgiving dinner she ate with her brother as previously arranged. The turkey was done to a tempting brown, and the pumpkin-pies, to poor Mary at least, were faultless.

CHAPTER LVIII.

A DISCOVERY.

POMEROY'S in Great Grand Street was a hotel much patronized by persons from the Eastern Indies—officers home on sick leave, dark-skinned ladies, with very scant rigs and jewelled caps, and who, standing at the windows in a blaze of diamonds and brocade, seemed to be perpetually waiting for coal-carts like them to a masquerade; by maharajahs, begums, governors-general, judges of remote provinces, and millionaire merchants returned to their native land, with the fond design of enjoying the fruits of their labors without livers to help the process of digestion.

Pomeroy's "laid itself out" for this particular class of visitors. Its apartments were furnished with great magnificence, displaying much gilding, embroidery, and yellow silk; it had suits of private rooms adapted for the privacy of social habit, and for the practice of every form of Eastern religious observance; it provided separate cuisines for various meats, strictly discriminating as to the requirements for different manners of eating, drinking, praying, and taking the bath; it had kitchens for all sorts of cookery, Christian and Mohammedan, Brahmin and Parsee; dining-rooms and undoes.

Pomeroy's was a very expensive establishment to stop at; and this was one of its chief recommendations to the fellow millionaires who patronized it. By taking up their residence at Pomeroy's they proclaimed to all their friends and to the world at large, through the columns of the Morning Post, that they were very rich, and consequently very important personages. The proprietors of Pomeroy's would not have been content to accept the same accommodation elsewhere for the money. They would flatly took a pride in was the fact that they paid an exorbitant price for every thing they had. If Pomeroy's ox-tail soup, or Pomeroy's curry-powder's had received a bill for such a modest sum as ten or a dozen pounds he would have resented it as an insult to their dignity. They would have suspected at once that he had been badly served; that they had gotten him inferior curry-stuff, or had gone to drink, inferior chairs to sit upon, and an inferior bed to sleep in. What was the good of being rich if you didn't? What is to be able to eat five-pound notes and drink sovereigns!

Such was Pomeroy's Hotel, ci which Jean Baptiste Constant was the manager and nominal proprietor.

Constant, sitting in the mourning-coach with Lily, on the way to Great Grand Street, opened a conversation with the new of preparing her for her new life and her new position. He began with some hesitation, for he had to tell her first of all about her father. Lily had remained, up to that moment, ignorant even of her father's name. She had continued to call herself, and to be called, Lily Florin. She was to know now that her name was Blunt.

"And my father?" she said, inquiringly; "all that I have heard of him is, that he illtreated my mother, that he was a bad man, and very poor—a beggar. Was he a beggar?"

"Your father, Lily," said Constant, evading a direct reply to the question in this form, "was a gentleman."

Francis Blunt was all that the countess called him—a cheat, a scoundrel, and a beggar; but from the valet's point of view he was still a gentleman.

"More than that," Constant continued, "your father was a member of a noble family of high descent and great wealth; and you, as his child, Lily Blunt, are a lady."

Lily felt a strange fluttering at her heart. It was not pride; it was scarcely joy. She was thinking of Edgar. Did he know that she was the daughter of an English gentleman?

"It is possible," said Constant, "that you may share the name of some of your English relatives, and be elevated to the position to which your birth entitles you. I have been searching for you for a long time, with the view of making you acquainted with your position, and, if possible, rescuing you from the misery which you have so long endured; but until chance took me to the circus at Ranelagh I failed in every endeavor to discover you."

Lily thanked him from the bottom of her heart. In the midst of her misery and desolation she had never dreamed that any one in the wide world was thinking of her. If she could only have known it her heart would not have been so dead to all hope.

Constant continued:

"It is my inclination, no less than my sacred duty, Lily, for I love you as if you were my own child—it is my dearest wish and desire to see you restored to your family; and if there is aught thing it is possible to do, with that object; but if I should fail—if the hope which I entertain should be disappointed—will you look upon me as guardian, your protector, your father?"

He implored her eagerly, as if he were afraid of being met by the proud and scornful spirit of her mother.

Lily, whose heart was overflowing with gratitude, put all his doubts to flight at once. She seized his hands and kissed them fervently.

"Heaven bless you!" she said. "I desire nothing better than to be your daughter, to tell you all that lies at my heart, and to ask for your advice and guidance."

In all his lifetime Jean Baptiste Constant had not experienced so pure a joy as at that moment. He felt a tremor of delight run through his whole frame. His heart, long since frozen up, melted before the sunshine of the girl's trusting, loving face, looking on his and calling him a bright vision of the past—his eyes filled with tears, and the strong, hardened man wept.

"God bless you!" he said; "those words have given me the first thrill of real pleasure I have ever felt since your mother spoke to me just as you are now, in the little village of Marouille, in France, where I first saw her."

Constant wiped the cloak at the corner of Great Grand Street, got out with Lily, and walked the rest of the way to the hotel. He paused as they were about to enter the house, and said:

"You will not forget that your name is Lily Blunt."

As Constant passed through the hall with Lily to his private apartments—after an introduction and its attendant circumstance carried him back to his old life at the Lilies of France to that time when Valérie was sadding and bridling, and stirring in his heart the flame of love long since quenched. A sigh escaped him as he thought of those days of hope, but the remembrance read him a lesson.

After Lily had partaken of some refreshment and rested for a little in the handsome sitting-room behind the bar, Constant, who had been attending to the calls of the hotel, returned to the room, and, with considerable hesitation and mystery of manner, requested her to perform a service.

Lily jumped up eagerly, and expressed her willingness to make herself useful to her guardian in any way.

"I long," she said, "to be employed, to have something to do, and if you will only let me be your servant—"

Constant stopped her.

"You forget, Lily, that you are a lady," he said. "I have no idea of making you a servant; but on this one occasion will you oblige me by—"

Lily interrupted him with an eager offer to perform any service he might require.

"Well," he said, "I only wish you shall be a chambermaid for once, and take up this glass of elder-flower water to the gentleman in the blue room. Stay, I will show you the way."

Lily took the silver salver from his hands and followed him to the foot of the principal staircase.

It is the second room on the first landing," he said. "Knock at the door before you enter."

Lily ascended the softly-carpeted stair, and proceeded as directed to the second door in the corridor. She knocked gently and timidly. There was no answer. She knocked again and saw Constant standing at the foot of the stairs watching her. She knocked again, and this time a feeble voice called, "Come in."

Lily opened the door and entered the room. It was a magnificent apartment furnished in blue and gold, with many ottomans and couches, covered with skins and richly-embroidered cloths, and over the moment, Lily was so dazzled by the splendor of the fittings, and her vision so lost in the vastness of the room, that she failed to discover the occupant of the bed. She laid the splendor of the fittings, and her vision so lost in the vastness of the room, that she failed to discover the occupant of the bed. She laid the salver upon the table, and, advancing further into the room, she discerned the figure of a man reclining upon a heap of pillows. He was an old man with gray hair and a very sallow complexion.

Lily went up to the couch with the salver in her hand and offered him the goblet of water. The old man turned to take it, and, as he did so, looked up in Lily's face. His outstretched hand suddenly fell by his side, and he uttered a cry of surprise.

"Again that face!" he exclaimed; "again that bright vision that I have seen so often; in life twice, in my dreams many times."

He passed his hand across his eyes, as if he were doubting his senses, and imagined that he was dreaming then. At length Lily spoke.

"I have been desired to bring you this, Sir," she said, stooping toward him with the goblet.

"Then it's not a dream this time," he said. "Who are you? Come nearer; let me touch you."

It was now Lily's turn to be startled. She hesitated and retired a step, timidly.

"Don't be afraid," he said. "I'm only a poor, weak old man; old before my time, my dear. Come close to me and let me touch your hand."

He spoke kindly and tenderly; and Lily, dismissing her foolish fears—for he was, to be sure, only a poor, weak, old man—advanced to the couch and held out her hand.

The old man took it and held it between his own cold palms, and peered into the girl's face curiously.

"The same blue eyes," he muttered, "the same soft brown hair, just as I can remember them—just as they are in the picture. Ah, you are a bonny, bonny lass, just such a child as her. Thank you; it's very kind of you to come up; come again, my dear, come again. Stop, you may as well set down the salver."

"My name is Lily, Sir."

"Lily, Lily," he repeated. "Ah, that is a pretty name; and what else?"

"Blunt, Sir," Lily replied.

The invalid, who had been reclining so languidly upon the couch, apparently without the strength to turn himself, started at the word and sprang to his feet.

"Blunt," he exclaimed, "Blunt! Am I dreaming, or—or are you playing a trick upon me?"

Lily scarcely knew what to reply to these inquiries. Who was this old man, and why had the mention of her father excited suspicion in him?

The invalid sank back upon the couch again, and sat gazing at Lily with a child-like wonder.

"Tell me," he said, "who are you? Who was your father? Was he Frank Blunt? Eh? eh?"

"I believe so, Sir," Lily answered.

"You believe so, child! Don't you know?"

"You believe so, Sir," Lily answered. "you believe so. Don't you know who your father was?"

"I have been told that my father's name was Francis Blunt."

"You have been told so, and don't know of your own knowledge. That's odd—very odd. And how did you come to be told so, child? How did a Blunt come to be a servant in a hotel?"

"I am not exactly a servant, Sir," Lily replied.

"Not exactly a servant!" he said. "Then what are you? I don't understand this mystery, a puzzle. Here, Franz, Franz, Franz Stimm, you rascal, come here."

It was clear that Franz Stimm was a party to Constant's plot, for he entered the room immediately his name was called.

"Come here, Sir," said the invalid; "do you know this young lady, or any thing about her?"

"Yah, mein signor, of course I knows dat young leddy; she is de leddy cal, ver much grown big, vat we see in de steamboat. Ah," his countenance continued, suddenly, "you forget me; but I not forget your preddy face."

"I have not forgotten you," said Lily; "you were very kind to me."

"Vat," cried Franz, "you remember de jogolate, eh?"

"What do you know about the young lady, Stimm?" the invalid asked.

"Mein generale," said the courier, "I know dat she is ver preddy child. Monsieur Constant knows all about her fadder and her moddor, de moddor dare you know, dat long like de—de—de—bamboo."

"Then let Monsieur Constant attend me," said the invalid.

Monsieur Constant was not far off, and Stimm returned with him instantly. Monsieur Constant explained all to the invalid in a few words. Lily was the daughter of Francis Blunt.

"And I," said the invalid, raising himself and holding out his hand to Lily, "I am George Blunt, your father's brother, and your uncle. Let me be your uncle and your father both, for your Frank's sake, and for our mother's sake; you are the very image of her."

And so Lily was adopted by the rich old nabob of Cutchapore, a widower without chick or child of his own to leave his millions to.

CHAPTER LIX.

THE BROKEN IDOL.

LILY was now no longer Quite Alone. Her uncle idolized her, and was never tired of smoothing her beautiful brown hair and gazing with childish rapture at her lovely blue eyes.

George Blunt had not brought much liver home with him from India, but he had managed to preserve his heart. The former organ he had sacrificed unscrupulously to get at all. In the pursuit of money-getting he had put his heart aside altogether, preserved it, as it were, in spirits of wine in a safe bottle. And now, when he had done with rupee grubbing, he opened the bottle and found his heart in a fine state of preservation.

He was quite foolish in his demonstrations of affection toward his pretty niece. He could not bear her to be out of his sight for a moment. He fondled and patted her as a child plays with a doll; he made presents of useless things to her in praise of her good looks, such childish nonsensical things that Lily quite blushed for him. If she had been a doll he would certainly never have rested until he had taken out and examined those lovely blue eyes which he was always looking at with so much wonder and delight.

Constant was jealous of the old man. So was Franz Stimm. Constant almost repented of having brought Lily and her uncle together. The good-hearted courier went about regretting that the "preddy liddle cal" had outgrown her taste for jogolate. The cook courage one day and respectfully suggested jogolate. Lily took none, which the courier offered her, and thanked him with many smiles, putting the sweetmeat in his pocket. Franz was quite hurt because she did not eat it there and then.

"Ah," he muttered to himself, "she is too big leddi now for jogolate; she is afraid of her stomjacks; but the liddle cal is never afraid of her stomjacks—oh no."

George Blunt had heard the history of his brother Frank's career from Constant, and repreached himself bitterly for not having been at hand to help him in his distress and misery. He now heard from Lily the history of her and life, and the pitiful story moved him to tears. She told him all, not even omitting the cause of her flight from Castle de Kergoday's—her passion for Edgar Greyfaunt.

"He is not worthy of you, my dear, can't be worthy of you," he said, "to treat you as he has done. But you shall be as good as he, or any of them; the blood of the Blunts runs in your veins, and your father and George Blunt will chink in your pocket, and I'll warrant you'll have a score of fellows at your feet in no time."

The Indian nabob, with all his ancient lineage, and no less pronut of his wealth, was deeply hurt at the idea that his niece's child being slighted and looked down upon; and he resolved that Lily should not only vindicate her position, but take place by it also. He was, in fact, determined to show in his own person (for he was a mere bag of bones) for the immense riches which he had accepted from his past. His poor mummy of a body, wrapped in the richest robes, and decked with the finest gems, was but an object of pity.

Lily in vain tried to call man's vision like a star in the dark. He found a beautiful idol upon which to bestow his wealth, and nothing on earth would wean them worthily, and command homage to his wealth. He loaded her with presents, dressed her in the richest clothes, had her with the rarest gems, engaged for her the handsomest suit of apartments in the hotel, bought her a brougham and a saddle-horse, and appointed a maid and a groom specially to attend upon her. The poor, friendless, lonely girl, so recently discharging the duties of nurse of a boy-actor's dresser in the gardens of Ranelagh, was now a princess.

But the jewels and the fine dresses did not make Lily happy. In the midst of the splendor in which she lived she was thinking with an aching heart of Edgar. His sudden disappearance on the night of her mother's death, and the evening after the check, filled her with a vague fear that something had happened to him. She shrank from making inquiries about him, partly from a feeling of modesty, partly because she was unwilling that any one should think she doubted him. She resolved to say nothing on the subject, but to wait at least, hoping that he would soon call to see her, or that she might meet him in the Park during her rides and drives. She was often in the Park daily; either in her brougham or on horseback. She had taken lessons in horsemanship, and became not a very short space of time an accomplished horsewoman. She had learned fast; for love was her teacher. She had learned to ride, that she might dispense with the attendance of a coachman and footman, and go out in the Park on horseback or in her carriage, and thus be favored her in every thing. If she had desired to ride in the Park on an elephant he would have sent another to Africa to procure her the finest specimen that could be found.

Weeks passed away, and Edgar had not called at the house. Lily succeeded in meeting him in the Park. Her uncle and Constant were with her in spite of her daily coaxings to the contrary, she was becoming pale, and thin, and care-worn. Constant was aware of Lily's passion for Edgar, and feeling assured that the malady was love-sickness he begged to be admitted to her confidence. After some hesitation she told him all, and he set to work to find out Edgar. She had been looking for Edgar day after day, and week after week, but in vain. She was afraid that he was dead, that some misfortune had befallen him. Constant undertook to make inquiries. Lily did so, and found that the magnificent Mr. Greyfaunt had been arrested for debt, and was locked up in a sponging-house in Cursitor Street.

The young scape-grace had set up for a man of fashion upon the little fortune left him by his second-aunt, Madame Desgodey. He managed to five thousand pounds, neither more nor less, and Edgar had spent the principal instead of the interest. He had for the time at the rate of three thousand a year.

Constant did not at once inform Lily of the discovery he had made. He was anxious to find out what sort of person Mr. Edgar Greyfaunt was. He had particular doubts about him before; but now, when he heard of him as the inhabitant of a sponging-house, he began at once to suspect that Edgar was a very bad young fellow. As a prosperous inn-keeper, Monsieur Constant regarded impecuniosity in a gentleman of Mr. Greyfaunt's position as the worst of crimes.

Constant employed Franz Stimm as his emissary and agent. Stimm visited the sponging-house, and saw Edgar, saying that he came from an unknown friend to offer his services to serve him. A few weeks behind prison bars had worked a great change upon the dandy—the usual change. The loss of liberty had degraded him, as it degrades nearly all men, however proud their spirit, however high their moral tone. In a few weeks the elegant exquisite had been transformed into a shabby, slouching jail-bird. He had taken to slippers and wide-awake hats, to spirits-and-water and clay pipes. He shuffled about in a paved yard behind the bars, and associated without scruple with all comers. Debt is a great leveler—as great a leveler as death. It makes the sponging-house or a prison at brings all ranks together, and links them in the bond of a common brotherhood. The most noble prince in his debtors' prison is he who owes most money. But the ultimate degradation he is forcing with a bird is one respect—he is a debtor. The influence of debt and durance manifests itself in both alike—is equally low-down-school which possesses so in clean linen, the growth of the beard, the smoking of common kinds of tobacco, and the consumption of vulgar drinks. Even if the lord have money, he finds, after a short residence in a debtors' prison, that he is acquiring a taste for the grosser kinds of luxuries. It begins to prefer shag tobacco to cigars, and to have an inordinate craving for beer.

Edgar very soon succumbed to the genius of that dingy house in Cursitor Street. Franz Stimm wondered what the gentleman inside habit could see in such a shabby-looking fellow. Franz was armed with very careful instructions. He informed Greyfaunt of Lily's existence, for instance. She had found her uncle, a rich Indian nabob (he did not mention his name), who had acquired her, and designed to be a father to Alicia of his vast wealth.

Edgar caught at the news eagerly, and his eyes sparkled with expectancy. "What a fool —what an ass I have been!" he muttered to himself. He remembered Stimm as the waiter of the unknown friend who had sent him the news. Stimm explained that the unknown friend, who was aware of the position in which Mr. Greyfaunt stood toward Miss Lily, had an eye to business.

"Very considerate," said Edgar; "he is a money-lender, and you are his agent."

Franz admitted that might be the case.

"Well, look here," said Edgar; "if you will lend me the money, and get me out of this confounded place you shall have twenty per cent. for your master, and fifty per cent. for yourself. It is only a miserable sum of two hundred pounds."

"But de security?" said Stimm.

"I have no security to offer you but my own note of hand, said Greyfaunt; "but you know what my expectations are. The girl is madly in love with me, and I have only to make her an offer to get her to consent. She will throw herself into my arms, fortune and all."

"Vill you get me a letter to dat effeck dat I show mein master?" said Stimm.

"Certainly," said Greyfaunt. "Who is your master? Let me know the name of my disinterested friend?"

"His name is Constant," said the courier.

"What! Constant, who keeps Pomeroy's Hotel?"

"De same," said Franz.

"Ah," said Greyfaunt, gayly, "they are sharp fellows, those hotel-keepers. Constant has, no doubt, got wind of the girl's attachment to me, and wants to do a piece of business over the affair. Very good, Monsieur Constant, I am obliged to you."

And the heartless puppy, who would not have hesitated to buy Lily first and sell her afterward, sat down and wrote a letter to the hotel-keeper. It ran thus:

"SIR,—If you are willing to lend me two hundred pounds, I will pay you my note of hand for three months, or a longer sum if you require it. I understand that you have an eye to the main chance in business, and have formed the daughter of a circus-woman into a sort of Indian heiress. Between ourselves, you are aware of the fact that she is devoted to me, and that I have only to hold out my hand to make her mine. Assist me in this matter and see and the golden prize but the helm and bare of this intimate saga. Keep your secretions like five-pound notes, and use discretion. If you serve me in this, you shall have no reason to complain of your share of the plunder.

"Yours, etc.,

"EDGAR GREYFAUNT.

"TO J. B. CONSTANT, Esquire."

"There," said Greyfaunt, "take your master that, and let me have an answer at once. Devil's are always waiting in these cases."

Stimm took the letter to his master, and Jean Baptiste Constant opened and read it. He had already been warned with respect to Greyfaunt's character, but he was not prepared for such heartlessness, such sordid baseness as this letter disclosed.

"The scoundrel!" he muttered through his teeth. "I should like for him to be my debtor. I should have murdered him. And it is for such a wretch as this that poor Lily is sighing her life away! But she must not know how base he is, but she shall know; she shall not remain ignorant of his character for one hour longer."

Constant's first impulse was to show Lily the letter at once; but on reflection he decided to prepare her more cautiously, and to break the news by degrees. He told her, first, that he had succeeded in discovering Greyfaunt.

Lily's quick mode of pleasure pained him, and filled his breast with anger. He could scarcely restrain himself. To the torment of anxious inquiries which the young girl put him he replied coldly, without any further attempt to soften the information which he had to convey.

"Edgar Greyfaunt," he said, "is at heart a heartless adventurer. Read that letter."

Lily read the letter, read it again and again without lifting her eyes, and at length her head sank upon her bosom, and the letter fell from her hands upon the floor. The idol was shattered, its shrine heart had set up for itself in the days of her solitude lay crushed and broken at her feet.

TUNNEL UNDER PITTSBURG.

THE great TUNNEL which has been excavated under the city of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, which we illustrate on page 773, will, in connection with bridges over the Monongahela and Ohio rivers, shorten the distance to Steubenville thirty miles. This will render the Steubenville and Pittsburg Railroad the nearest and most available route from New York to Cincinnati. The tunnel runs beneath some of the largest edifices of Pittsburg, and but for its very substantial structure would certainly endanger some of the habitations of that smoky town.

A LAMENT.

Frozen the new-born snow-drops of the spring,
Palsied the blue-bells of the waning year,
Richer and richer every mystic thing
That heavenly thought to earthly hearts doth bring—
The stars that beckon and the winds that stir,
If thou wert here.

And lovelier far the mountain and the lake,
More gay the summer, tenderer autumn sere,
And birds would blither pipe from bower and brake,
And kindlier maids would live with us make,
And less wild whispers through the poplars shake,
If thou were here.

Fields would gleam greener in the morning fine,
Shadows fall softer in the even clear,
And nothing but some angelic benign
Go those desiring eyes enchanted shine,
And music flow a sweeter strain divine,
If thou were here.

Selfs-seeking weeds would not spring up every-slow,
Nor th' long hours of lonesome doubt be dear,
Nor eyes look wistful for the daylight glow,
Nor gloomy sleep drift to sadness so,
Nor dream-joys sicken into woe,
If thou were here.

And paths were pleasant which I shuddering shun,
And care blush birthday were a day of cheer,
And hope's light duties wondrous wrath had won,
And likeness have its delight worn done,
And all were brighter underneath the sun,
If thou were here.

UNCLE GODFREY.

I.—TODMORTEN RECTORY.

IT was the day before Christmas-day, and the Rev. Mr. Latimer was busy finishing his Christmas sermon, or rather, if we must confess it, "heel-tapping" on it.

The reverend gentleman had just settled the Cockatrice account, and that excellent work of charity had warmed his heart, and made him at peace with all the world. The frost was feathering the window-panes, in the ruts of the Todmorten lanes the ice lay like fragments of shivered plate-glass; the twigs of the laurel-bushes at the rectory window were tufted with crystals, and the robin, puffing out his little crimson breast till it looked like an alderman's waistcoat, sat on the standard rose-tree in the study window, watching, with interest, Mr. Latimer as he put the new piece into the old garment.

The sermon completed, Mr. Latimer went heartforemost into the Blanket-club accounts, and soon discovered the pleasing fact that there was an overplus of seven pound ten. All this conduced to make the worthy young rector extremely cheerful, and in a paroxysm of Christmas fervor of mind. He hummed a carol to himself, and prepared to go out to superintend the clerk, who was busy decorating the church with holly.

But young rectors with large families, if they have their pleasures, have also their alloys. The monthly week had just begun, and a huge screen of steaming sheets is by no means a conducive of heat, especially when placed between yourself and the fire; nor does the necessity of changing these square acres of linen at fitting intervals conduce to the concentration of mind that accounts require.

A cook must have unceasing pleasure in the savory chemistry of his profession; but to watch a large saucepan for the ninth consecutive quarter of an hour, under pain of your wife's indignation, is not consistent with any steady mental labor. Yet all these and numerous the Rev. Frederick Latimer bore like a Christian and a lamb, for he was a good, kind-hearted, domestic man, who respected the saving of the family wash, and knew that the kitchen-fire was fully occupied, and that what-ever did was not to be extravagation.

That slapping and shaking noise in the kitchen was, he knew, Mrs. Latimer folding, and that sound portended the passing fact that there was an overplus of seven pound ten. All this conduced to make the worthy young rector extremely cheerful, and in a paroxysm of Christmas fervor of mind. He hummed a carol to himself, and prepared to go out to superintend the clerk, who was busy decorating the church with holly.

That slapping and shaking noise in the kitchen was, he knew, Mrs. Latimer folding, and that sound portended the passing fact that the busy day he was willing to make himself useful.

The children were out sliding—getting fiery red by vanishing on the back of their hands, and performing the "cobbler's knock" on the village-pond. They had been busily cutting holly-boughs for the church that morning, and the sliding was their reward.

"Jane, my dear," cried the Rev. Mr. Latimer to his wife, as he put on his great-coat and hat, and seized his black-thorn stick, "I'm just going to see old Martha Hackney and that I shall come to the church and see how Payne gets on with the decorations. I shall be back to lunch at one. Those sheets in my study are quite dry, and the sauce-pan has been on the boil ten minutes."

"Stop a moment, Fred," cried Mrs. Latimer; "I want to speak to you before you go out."

Mr. Latimer was ruffled. "Well, now, what is it, my dear? I am in a mortal hurry, so don't be off."

Mrs. Latimer appeared, and remonstrated. "Why, Fred, how impatient you are! All I want to ask is, if you write your usual invitation to Uncle Godfrey for Christmas. Of course he won't come, but still we oughtn't to forget him."

"Yes, I wrote on Monday. Did I ever forget to write to him—the old selfish hunks! Good-by, darling. Send down for the children if they are not in in half an hour; it is now just eleven."

II.—THE ELEVEN-FORTY TRAIN.

TODMORTEN was a pretty village in Dorsetshire, It lay in a little valley, surrounded by wooded hills and sloping fields, and was intersected by a railway.

The eleven-forty train slided out of the distance and stopped, with bragging puffs of smoke, at the Todmorten Station. It took up its load and slid off again, with jerks of white vapor, and disappeared in the direction of Poole. The station grew again lonely; and the only sounds, the rattling of the tight cords of the signal-post, and the murmur of the wind against the telegraph-wires.

Ten minutes after the solitary arrival an old-fashioned man with a cane stumped slowly up Todmorten Hill. The butcher saw him, the grocer saw him, the blacksmith saw him, the gents at the bar-parlor of the Peal of Bells saw him, and discussed him. One and all pronounced him to be "a regular old guy," a character drawn by the train, and bound to the neighboring village.

The children from the rectory window saw him —for the rectory was on the hill, and commanded the village—and marveled at his wooden leg.

The eldest girl, Dora, her golden fleece of back hair tossing in the air, ran to declare to him to Mrs. Latimer. "Oh, mamma," she cried, "there is such a funny man coming up the hill—he's got a wooden leg!" George says he moves it as if it was a compass and he was drawing a circle. Oh, it's such fun! Do come and see!"

Mrs. Latimer allowed herself to be dragged into the parlor by Dora, George, and Willy, and looked through the window. The wooden-legged man was only thirty yards off. She had no sooner seen him than she gave a hysterical scream, and exclaimed, "Uncle Godfrey! Run, Dora, and tell cook to go and take the sheets and the sauce-pan out of the study; and, George, go and tell Susan to get on a clean apron, and go to the front-door. Dear me, how unfortunate papa not being in!"

The scene that immediately ensued was one for the rectory gravel-walk, and a sharp, cart knock at the door. Susan was a long time answering the door; when she did so she received a rebuke that she did not soon forget.

"Young woman," said the old gentleman, forcibly, "it is quite plain that you are taught to attend to your master's visitors? Nice weather to be kept in the cold. Ugh! it bites one's nose off. Sickly you're not in my service, or out you go this month. Is Mr. Latimer in?"

"Yes, sir—he's visiting the thing"—thought Susan, as she replied: "No, Sir; Mr. Latimer is out in the parish."

"Who cares where he is? If he's not in, where's your missus?"

"Up stairs."

"Very well, then, tell her to come down stairs."

"What name, if you please?"

"Godfrey Dodson."

Susan swept out of the room. She never saw such a crow, unmannerly old "thing" in the whole course of her life; and so she told Mrs. Wise cook.

Uncle Godfrey was a shaky, irascible little man, who wore a brown spencer, a low-crowned hat of the old fashion, and highly-polished cane twenty years ago, and long drab gaiters. He was an old-bachelor recluse, who lived in the Adelphi, in rooms which he never allowed any body to enter, and which were stuffed full of pictures, etchings, bulb cabinets, snuff-boxes, and old china. Early in life he had been a dry-salter in Thames-street since then had devoted himself laboriously to doing nothing, and exciting the expectations of his poorer relations. Mrs. Latimer had been his last uncle once since she was married.

Godfrey Dodson was one of those old connoisseurs who are to be seen any morning in the showrooms of Mesrs. Christie & Manson, examining etchings suspiciously through their spectacles, gesturing and shutting with half delight, half distrust, remarkable agate snuff-boxes, walking backward from specimen to specimen, and then handing the drawers of inlaid cabinets, and looking for the maker's name and date of lustrous majolica plates. They know the value of everything, and what paid, and where the original of it is, and what is fetched. They know every connection that Hogarth has in his engravings, and fall into raptures over what other people would think a defect. They eye a water-mirror with the look of mute mystery and cunning, and the dealers with glances of hostility and distrust. They hoard and accumulate the gems of all ages of taste and fashion, and pick and enjoy the pleasant reflection that when they die the sale of their effects will be held in the same room as that in which they have spent so much of their time, and will give extreme delight to a great many collectors, their old rivals during life; for the finest collectors are those who have the most leaves scattered in a field, that must sooner or later be gathered together. Uncle Godfrey as long as the world goes on spinning.

Uncle Godfrey had a lean, wizen face; cold, keen, gray eyes, and a sharp, pointy, white head, over-hanging eyebrows, and a projecting lower lip that expressed a sour contempt for all he heard and saw. He was a man who had outlived his age, and the little scarlet under-waistcoat, with just the edge showing, such as was the fashion forty years ago. Altogether, he looked like a cross Cupid. In fact, he was a shrewd, cynical old hunks; eccentric, dogmatic, rich, and arbitrary.

When Mrs. Latimer, not waiting to change her dress, but just adjusting her cap, and making her-self look tidy, came into the parlor, Godfrey half frightened, Uncle Godfrey was standing with his back to the door examining a print of "Bolton Abbey in the Olden Time" with a magnifying-glass.

He turned round as his niece entered, and without greeting her, and just as if he had been an inmate of the house for twenty years, said with a sort of grunt, "This is the sort of rubbish people in the country hang on their walls instead of having one or two good pictures. Ugh! It is only fit for a coulterer's parlor."

"Dear uncle, Frederick and I can not afford pictures. But how are you? How long it is since we have seen you! Why don't you come oftener? What a happy Christmas we shall spend!" And all the time she kept saying to herself, "Only to think of his coming!"

Uncle Godfrey watched her from under his terrier eyebrows for a moment or two in suspicious silence; then he took her hand, and looking her searchingly in the face, he said: "Jane, you are a sensible girl; I've didn't keep me waiting while you put on a lot of finery. Don't thank me for coming down to see you, for I only did it because I thought you didn't mean it, and I thought it would teach you a lesson; and as to pictures, I suppose you can't afford them. I know I can't. I sell mine as fast as I buy them—ugh! and at a good profit too. Where are the children? Plenty of them, I suppose; the poorer a man is the more children Providence always sends him. Ugh! Where's Latimer?"

"Gone out, dear uncle, to see the poor, and how to distribute the Christmas charities; and I ought to be out with him; but, you see, we poor people have to attend to a great deal of things."

"There; no ostentation of poverty and economy. Stuff about Christmas! Why give away more than usual at Christmas? Is a man more hungry at Christmas, or colder, or poorer? Aren't there other times to carry it? Bah! I hate Christmas—all one's bills come in then."

"Oh, there's Frederick coming—I'm so glad!" said Mrs. Latimer, looking out of the window. "Oh, how glad he will be to see you, uncle!"

"Not so sure of that, though I am rich. Now, mind, I'll have no fuss made about me—no extras. As for wine, I've brought down some of my own. Don't like port and hard catching, and the other half long-cut. No, don't go; I'll open the box."

Away stumped the strange being to open the box. Mr. Latimer arrived, horror-struck, at the wooden-legged apparition.

"I thought it would knock you down," said Uncle Godfrey. "Never ask a man again you don't want to see."

"But I'm delighted. My dear Sir—"

"There, that'll do. Here I am, and you must make the best of me for a week. You're quite right to ask me. The Fitzarmonsons asked me too, and I governed to them. Confound Christmas! I wish it was abolished. Festivity, indeed! Why, I'd rather be sitting in my own room with a bottle or the Cock in Fleet Street, than share the best Christmas dinner in England."

Mr. Latimer did not know whether to be offended or not, but, as he had expectations from Uncle Godfrey, he thought, on the whole, he had better bear it, so he smiled, and let the man by the hand.

In rushed the children, but when they saw the stranger they drew back. Dora seated herself in a by-place on a chair, and George came cautiously up to his father, and took his hand; while Willy, in the "dip," nestled up to his mother, and half hid himself in her gown.

"George used to be your favorite, uncle," said Mrs. Latimer.

Uncle Godfrey looked at him, and growled: "Time he went to sea. Ugh! Do you send that girl to school? I'll not have you cut her hair short-cr? She'll be bald at thirty."

Mrs. Latimer was indignant; but nothing made any impression on his rich nature, who, turning his back on her, proceeded to question her husband.

"Mr. Latimer," said he, "still grubbing on as a curate, I suppose. Nice profession: its prizes so easy to get, and so evenly distributed. Bishops so humble and curates so high. Six days' hard work for a curate, and a hundred a year the end of it. Every one on you for alms, and obliged to give more than you can afford with ten thousand a year. Better be a laborer. Ugh! Any head-clerk in a merchant's office could buy up three curates. Ugh!"

Mr. Latimer submitted to Uncle Godfrey's severity. "Our life," he said, "is humble, but it is happy, and free from temptations. There is time for study, and time for the simple pleasures. Grand people are too busy for domestic happiness; bosses always too full to enjoy the society of their wives and children. Every one has his lot given him by God, and he could not buy my happiness."

"Good—something in that. But suppose you live above your means, and debts press. Responsibilities of the rich without their means; too proud to put your self-denials in the pawn-broker's shop. Ugh! I thought Christianity taught humility. You clergy preach it enough, but where's the practicing?"

"My dear Sir, you do me wrong. I would willingly get George into a banker's office when he is old enough, but even city situations are hard to get."

"Take you at your word. I'll get the boy into a house in Mincing-lane. I am low-church—that's the to get on; better than your beggarly profession, and bring up your family paupers."

Mr. Latimer winced, but still thanks.

"There; no trying to please the rich old uncle, just because he is rich. I will see to your keen arranging the Christmas charities. Ugh! all folly, makes the poor people mendicants. Who'll work when they get more begging? Got a night-school in your parish?"

"We have—a flourishing one."

"There again—pauperizing the poor. Teaching servants to read one's letters, and forge and swindle. Stuff! When do you dine? I'm hungry. Shouldn't object to a glass of wine—my own, though. The porter's brought it up from the station by this time. Where's my bottle-case? I like a fire at table. I'll just go and wash my hands, and take my spencer off, while you get a crust and a glass of my own port ready. Where's the box?—this place is. Get out of the way, children!"

"What a horrid old creature!" thought ——. George was secretly examining his wooden leg, and wondering whether it moved by clock-work.

Uncle Godfrey was not softened even by dinner.

"Jane," said he, "never have soup till you have a cook that understands it. This is paste, not soup. You girl, keep the door shut—the draught comes to my back; and keep the fire up; it is all in one corner. I don't like stale bread. Haven't you got some new, and no crust? Can't you see I've got false teeth?"

"Jane," said he, a little later, "the mutton hasn't hung long enough. I suppose you play on the piano, and let the cook do as she likes. Take my advice—discharge that woman; the potatoes are as hard as bullets."

Over his wine Mr. Latimer—his wife being gone with the children—ventured to lament the ascetic loneliness of Uncle Godfrey's life, and to wish he lived nearer to them.

"I like it," said the amiable Anchorite of the Adelphi. "Every one to his taste. Some people like gidgety children, that break and spoil every thing, and scream all day. Ugh! Latimer, when I was young I had a disappointment that in one day turned my heart into a jar of vinegar; my blood since that is cold and sour. I have my own fancies, and I follow them. I'd rather die in a ditch than surrounded by legacy-hunters—counting the sand in my hour-glass as it ran out, pampering me, encouraging my follies, agreeing with me, and all the time hoping to see the hearse come and fetch me to the nettly damp corner of some respectable cemetery. Ugh! I know them, I know them; but they shall wait a bit—they shall wait a bit. Pass the bottle. Why doesn't that slut bring the coffee?"

That night Mr. and Mrs. Latimer, when their pleasant guest had gone to bed, and all the house was quiet, discussed Uncle Godfrey.

Mr. Latimer, with all his amiability, was much irritated at the brutality and rudeness of the rich, ill-mannered old hunker.

"But, my dear Fred," said Mrs. Latimer, "remember the legacy. We must bear with every. Remember we have expectations; and do think of those dreadful bills, and how little we have to meet them."

"My dear Jane," said her husband, "I could do any thing for your sake and for the children's; but I really can not bear with his rudeness. Every kind word he attributes to our hopes of his money —bother his money!"

"Fred!"

"I tell you, Jane, I can not and will not bear with mean suspicion. My blood is not thoroughly blunted by poverty, but still I am not all earth yet, and bear it I will not. If I am civil to him, remember, Jane, it is because he is your relation."

The next day was Christmas-day, and Uncle Godfrey was off to church triumphantly by Mrs. Latimer and the children, and ensconced in a bower of bolly, and under an emblazoned mural monument to the memory of General Bunnagates, a hero of the old American war.

At dinner that day Uncle Godfrey was more on country churches.

"Too much coughing," he said. "Ugh! Why do you allow the sexton to ring the bell seven in the aisle? They are all deaf; they only come to advertise themselves, as wanting new shoes and fresh cloaks. Don't know them. Don't like the duck quacked when you were reading, and how that donkey brayed when you read those bans, as if rejoicing at another fool's marriage. Latimer, you shout over the people's heads. What on earth do your churchmen care about the Antitheses sent into the errors of the Welsh Pelagius. Bah! Follow them into their daily life; they don't know how to live on earth yet; much less fit for that before you go further.—You, girl, don't grin there, but give me some beer.—Jane, do you teach Dora to eat with the knife, and George to throw breadcrumbs at Willy? Thank Heaven, I'm a bachelor!"

At whist, his favorite game, Uncle Godfrey was still more terrible. He always refused to take dummy. He stumped with his wooden leg if his partner held bad hands, played card, or trumped a trick on any momentary absence of mind. If the game went ill, and Mrs. Latimer and her partner were a-loose, he grew malicious, and openly hinted that his opponent was losing on purpose to please him—an insult to his play; and Mr. Latimer resumed the accusation.

"They always do it at the Fitzarmonses," replied Uncle Godfrey. "I know them. They let me win shillings in hope some day they'll turn to guineas; but I'll outlive them yet. That Fitzarmons is as rich as his cheek-bones, you've your chest, Latimer? I thought your voice weaker than it used to be.—George, don't bend the wires with the humming-top.—Jane, do you ever flog that boy?"

"Uncle," said Mrs. Latimer at breakfast on the seventh day of the visit, "I have arranged with Mrs. Benson to go to-morrow to see Melcombe—it is one of our show-places—you must not return without seeing that."

"Hate show-places: cold, damp rooms; fusty, pompous housekeepers; stop and tell you any thing; willing enough to take large fees; hurried, and see nothing. I go back to-morrow."

"To-morrow!" cried Mr. and Mrs. Latimer in a breath, for they had grown accustomed to the old bachelor's fidgetiness, and hoped to be amused with his shrewd honesty and caustic frankness.

"To-morrow—said to-morrow when I came—and means to-day. I said, bygone on you no longer; post people. Besides, all my port's gone—can't drink catchup and logwood. I and my wooden leg go to-morrow—that's all, ain't you, Dora?—George, come here and polish my wooden leg.—Willy, give uncle a kiss, and go to bed; it is getting late.—You'll be a happy family to-morrow, Uncle Godfrey back in his den."

The morrow came, somehow or other. The Latimers were sorry to part with the old Tartar. The children liked his odd stories, and the tricks he showed them with cards; his ventriloquism, and the droll drawings he did for them.

The train came sliding in, carving-like a great white serpent. Uncle Godfrey mounted into a second-class carriage, and shook all the Latimers by the hand.

"You won't see me again," he said; "I will not see many more winters. Admiral Death has already hoisted the storm-signal for me. Good-by. Don't let the children eat too much. When I die I shall leave you a set of china, just to remember me.—Good-by, Latimer; good-by, Dora, dear; good-by, Jane, my love; good-by, Willy, pet; good-by, George. If I liked my visit, though you did let me win at whist."

The train slid off.

"Well, somehow or other, I miss him," said Mrs. Latimer.

Her husband did not assent very warmly to his wife's remark. An old thought had struck him, as the children ran laughing and bounding on before their father and mother.

"How strange it would be, Jane," said the good, thoughtful man, turning on the frost-bound hill to watch the train, now a mere swift black caterpillar in the valley,—"how strange it would be if, instead of dying with a struggle and a wrench, or in slow pain and decay, as we do now, when man were to die, a mysterious summons should come in a black letter, warning us, on a certain day and hour, to be at the nearest railway station. Then, that we should go, after a calm but still ineffably solemn farewell, and at the appointed hour, a mysterious black train, spirit-driven, should arrive, and an irresistible impulse should force us then to mount into the carriage, and be borne off swiftly, quietly, into the inscrutable far distance."

"Oh, Fred, how can you think of such horrid things!" said Mrs. Latimer.—"Well, do you know, somehow or other, I do miss Uncle Godfrey."

"And so do we," cried the children.

"I hope he'll write!" said "Tot."

"Will he ever come to see us again?" asked George.

"Now if I can help it," thought Mr. Latimer, clenching his teeth, and looking as sternly as he could.

III.—THE CARRION CROWS.

EXACTLY twelve months from the date of that visit Uncle Godfrey was found dead in his armchair, in his solitary chambers at Addle Hill. It is probable that he had been dead several days, for though the laundress had neglected to inform the neighbors, no light had been seen in the room for three nights. Singularly enough, it was remembered that the deceased had latterly shown some desire to be more social, and had even appeared spectrally one night in full dress at the door of the gentleman on the first floor, who, when he opened, just starting for a party, and could not see him.

The rooms were found to be an inch deep in snuff-like dust, crowded with china, pictures, furniture, and port-folios. The inner room resembled an immense museum-case, for it was strewn with pounds of bacon and sections of cheap cheese. A miser and a millionaire—Nebuchadnezzar driven from men, and living upon grass—what could be more insane than to have inhabited these chambers together. Oh, what misery, and deadness of heart, and deprivation of every human pleasure! what cares, if insane blindness to, love and home, were evidences in that sordid solitude, in that voluntary prison, in that shameful hustle!

It was too late. The hoarder had been torn from his hoard by no earthly power or thief, but by the great severer of all human ties.

After Godfrey Dodson's funeral his will was read at the office of his lawyers, Messrs. Fox and Skekell.

No one was present but the Fitzsimmonses, but they were in force—Mr. F., a friend of the late Mrs. F., a vulgar, strong-minded woman, who was alternately smiles and tears; and the three Misses F., all apparently of the same age, and quite distinguishable apart by the graduated redness of their noses, and the comparative hardness of their spinster faces.

They were all in black, and looked like the Fates, waiting for the shears, the distaff, and the scissors. They were all shrouded in crape; they all wore coarse black kid gloves too big for them, and with great black pudgy fingers an inch too long.

If grief could be expressed by crape the Fitzsimmonses were heart-broken. They were swathed in crape; it was a top-heavy burden of crape on Fitzsimmons's hat; there were wisps of crape on Mrs. F.'s bonnet; they gloried in crape. They looked like the ghost of a young undertaker who has just secured a small funeral, and was proud of the business.

The room was one of those drab-colored, dingy lawyers' rooms, walled in with deed-boxes—the black sarcophagi of extinct fortunes; a ceiling black with smoke; the cocoa-nut matting dirty, and splashed with ink.

After a good deal of whispering with clerks, and running in and out with law-papers, Mr. Fox sat down, cracked jointly, opened the will, rubbed his hands, and began to read it.

It was very short. The deceased had left five thousand pounds to the Fitzsimmonses, all the china and pictures also to them; and nothing to the poor Latimers but his wooden leg, to be sent to them as a remembrance.

The Fitzsimmonses thrilled with delight; the black forest of crape rustled with satisfaction. Every one put on a shrewd look, and Mr. Fox and Mr. Fox poured them each out a glass of sherry, and then pocketed half out one, and drank their health. Then there was a universal eulogy of the "dear deceased," and some unnecessary wiping of eyes, till they looked real and natural.

"Depend upon me, my dear friends," said Mr. Fox, rubbing his hands as undertakers do after a successful funeral—"depend upon me, that you shall be settled as soon as possible. I will set all my clerks upon it.—Parker, mind you begin this matter early to-morrow morning. I shall pack up our poor friend Latimer's legacy to-night. Ha, ha! Oh dear, oh dear, what an eccentric being!"

The Fitzsimmonses sniggled maliciously.

IV.—THE LEGACY.

IT had been a hard year for the poor Latimers. George had gone to school, and that was expensive. A needy brother returning from Canada had drained off the rest of worthy Mr. L.'s ready money. And now it wanted three days to the time of paying the interest on his life-insurance for his wife, and where to turn to for a spare ten pounds he did not know.

When the master is sad, if there is any sympathy or love in a family, every one is more or less depressed. So it was that that solid Mars evening the Latimers, as they sat round the fire after dinner discussing not "the catalog and logwood," but some humble mulled elder-wine, were silent and sad. George held Dora's hand, and Willy nestled on the footstool. Suddenly the door opened, and Susan came in. "If you please, Sir, there is a large hamper come from the station; six-and-twopence to pay."

"How jolly!" said George, leaping up and clapping his hands.

Mr. Latimer, as he counted out the money, looked as if he thought paying six-and-twopence was by no means jolly.

"What can it be?" said Mrs. Latimer.

The hamper came in. It was tied round with red tape, and sealed with black. On the card was written, "To re GODFREY DODSON, deceased.—With Messrs. FOX and SHEKELL's compliments."

The Latimers had long since left off entertain any hope of a legacy, but hope now rose again in their eyes.

"Hurrah! here's my knife, papa," cried George.

"It's china!" said Dora.

"Give me some of it," cried "Tot," whose head had not yet risen above the level of the table, and therefore could see nothing of the interior of the mysterious hamper.

Mr. Latimer cut the red tape. The hamper was full of hay, and on the hay was a sealed letter in the late Godfrey Dodson's hand. Mr. Latimer tore it open. The contents ran thus:

"DEAR LATIMER,—I found out the tricks and humbug of the Fitzsimmonses. My property is to be respected, and love you and Jane. I have been a fool to live as I have done, but it is too late to alter now. The keepsake I send is rather curious. It is mechanical, and will work well. Uncle Godfrey sometimes. Farewell.

"GODFREY DODSON."

In a moment Mr. Latimer's hand plunged into the hay, and drew out, not a casket nor a box of gold, but Uncle Godfrey's wooden leg.

For a moment Mr. Latimer remained as if turned to stone, and grasping the wooden leg in his hand. Then the color mounted to his face, he cried, sternly, "George, run and ask cook for the bill-book from the wood-house."

George ran, and Mr. Latimer seized her husband's arm. "Don't, Fred, don't; it is cruel. But what could we do?" she said.

"Selish, heartless old miser!" cried her husband, stamping his foot. "What right had he to come here with his wooden leg, and his money, to do all the vile thing? Was he not hard, and frozen, and cold, less enough in his lifetime, but must he rise from his very grave to chill us? Jane, I am ashamed, at such a moment, to, of pain and anxiety?"

George ran in at this moment with a heavy shary bill-book.

"Thus," said Latimer, with a clearing blow. "do I treat his cruel present to its only real use—to feed the fire and perish, a memory of all useless, selish men will perish."

As he said this Latimer lopped off the peg-end of the leg and thrust it into the fire, where it instantly broke into a rejoicing blaze. At the second blow the bill-book struck down on the wood, and refused to go further. Taken out and restruck there was a metallic sound, as if it had reached some iron screw. Mr. Latimer now found that a small flat box had somehow or other been slid into the centre of the block. The astonishment and excitement were extreme.

George ran for the meat-saw, and two skilful cross-cuts disclosed the box. The saw soldered down. What could it be? Mr. Latimer got a sardine-knife, and ripping it open discovered that it was full of paper, a further search disclosed five thousand pounds in closely-wedged bank-notes. One thousand pounds' worth were labeled "Jane;" another thousand, "Dora;" the rest, "George" and "Willy:" a fourth thousand, "Dora;" a fifth thousand, "Tot." On many of them there were crumpled blisters, as if a tear or two had fallen on the paper.

How can I describe the joy and gratitude of good people—how Mr. Latimer kissed Mrs. Latimer, then all the children—and how the children danced for joy, and shouted in the manner. I'm dated you see, the February of last year. The deceased died in October."

Mr. Latimer, so tardy in turning up, the deceased had left all his money to the Latimers, and all his china, etchings, etc., to the Fitzsimmonses—subject, however, to a payment of ten years' arrears of rent for the chambers in the Adelphi, and severance deductions to orphan asylums. The residue —£13 8*s.* 4*d.*—was paid to indignant Mr. Fitzsimmons, who heaped his feeble spite upon the memory of the late Godfrey Dodson, Esq.

V.—A SMILE.

"My dear Jane," said Mr. Rev. Mr. Latimer the other night, laying down a book on "The Client Country" that he had been reading—for he has given up catching and logwood now, and is curious in his wines—"I have found out an excellent simile for Uncle Godfrey. When a sleeping proprietor wants to get especially good Clos Vougeot he places the wine out night after night in the frost. This, by degrees, crystallizes all the watery part of the wine in the outer crust, which is daily removed and thrown away. The real soul and essence of the wine, however, remains in the centre, in an unfrozen kernel, which is highly valued. In Uncle Godfrey's heart, my love, there was hoarded up, in the same manner, the purer essence, far, far from the outer crust of ice."

HOW ENGLISH WORKING-PEOPLE LIVE.

NOTHING can be more surprising to the American people than the extreme indigency and physical degeneracy of the British working-people. Mr. Kay's work on the Social Condition and Education of the People in England, published last year in London, and reprinted in this country, made some remarkable disclosures, bearing especially upon the moral condition of these people. At the close of his work Mr. Kay says: "The poor of England are more depressed, more pauperized, more numerous in comparison to the other classes, more irreligious, and very much worse educated than the poor of any other European nation, solely excepting Russia, Turkey, Southern Italy, Portugal, and Spain."

The medical officer of the Privy Council in England is required to submit annually a report of the sanitary condition of the poor. This duty has devolved upon Mr. John Simon, whose series of reports for the last four years is a harmonized body of practical information on the causes and distribution of disease. His last report, for 1864, is full of interesting and important truth respecting the amount and kind of food eaten by the working-classes. As Mr. Kay's book related to the causes leading to moral degeneracy, this report is concerned chiefly with those which conduce to physical deterioration.

For the purposes of investigation inquiry was made in about three hundred households selected as fair samples of their class. The inquirer set out with this theory; namely, that to prevent starvation or the consumption attended with it, a woman must have in her food daily 3000 grains of carbon and 180 of nitrogen, or as much nourishment as is contained in a half-quartern loaf of bread. A man wants one-ninth more.

Forty-two families of silk-weavers were examined, and it was found that these did not quite come up to this minimum standard; and thirty-one families of shoemakers, who fell very far short; and of farm-laborers' families more than one-third were below the mark. Of course this sacrifice of appetite was made before every other article of sacrifice had been made, after necessary clothing and fuel had been dispensed with.

It is true that the silk-weavers and twisters that, while over twelve pounds of bread were necessary to each adult, little more than nine were eaten. By their earnings a penny-worth a great deal of money was wasted. The children working away from home, instead of taking with them dinner prepared by the mother, are supplied with a penny-half pence or two-pence a day dinner-money, which they spend in a penny-worth of bread, a penny-worth of pudding and a half-penny upon potatoes. When they spend two-pence, they are permitted to sit down and have a little meat or fat added to their meal.

Of all classes the needle-women fare the worst. They take to their calling when every other resource fails, and their average income is below four shillings (less than one dollar) per week; sometimes, too, they are out of employment. They use a little over an ounce of tea per day, into which they rarely put milk. Of meat some buy two pounds per week, and a quarter of a pound of salted meat three times a week, and twice that amount on Sunday.

Glove-stitchers, in order to earn five shillings and sixpence a week, are compelled to work from six in the morning until eleven at night; and even children of seven and eight years of age are kept all day at this employment.

As a general result of the inquiry among all these classes, it appears that of bread the needle-women ate least, the shoemakers most; that of the persons interrogated in all classes, only four—three of them being kid-glovers—were wholly without sugar, the kid-glovers generally using least sugar, the needlewomen and the shoemakers most; the balance of carbon in the diet being readjusted in these cases by an exactly reverse proportion in the use of butter. Only a very small possible number of cases was there no meat at all eaten, and the five were all found among the silk-weavers of Macclesfield and Coventry. Scarcely in every hundred are butchers' meat in no appreciable quantity, preferring to use bacon. Beer of the ordinary strength was found to be drunk very generally by the silk-weavers of London, and by the shoemakers, and a very weak beer by the needle-women and the kid-glovers.

In the case of outdoor laborers, where there is not much meat used, it is all cooked for the Sunday's dinner. Generally the only one at which the whole family is collected and sits at rest together in unwonted ease. What is left from the Sunday dinner is on the following day eaten for husband's, and whether he takes it with him bit by bit to his work, and there finishes it, or eats it at home, it is, as a matter of course, ungrudged. The household faith is "that the husband wins the bread, and must have the best." Next to this physical well-being is the prop of the house. If he have eaten up his remainder of meat or bacon by the middle of the week, and there be none or cheese, he takes that for his dinner at the close of the week, and the wife and children at home are then reduced to dry bread, which is converted into a hot meal by the use of tea.

Of course this state of affairs is a great hindrance to marriage. A man alone can subsist comfortably, and the temptation to remain single is reluctantly overcome, when by marrying he is certain to deprive himself of that absolutely necessary to health. The farm-laborer, apart from a family, is adequately fed, long lived, and little troubled with sickness. When he takes his meals at the farmhouse, his rick in the way of diet is from over-feeding. He has usually four meals a day—meat and bacon once, twice, and even three times a day; milk twice a day; puddings or pies three times a day in Devon, and usually daily elsewhere; beer also or cider. In Yorkshire he is found to get cheese-cakes and custards almost daily at breakfast and dinner, or supper, in addition to hour's nap afterdinner. He objects to mutton because it is fat, and throws his fat under the table. Living in this sumptuous manner, he will put off as far as possible the evil day which shall bring poverty and starvation. Compared with the state of society in needless, but it is with gratitude that we compare the happiness of our own working-people with that of the English poor. The contrast should be forcibly felt by us in these troublous times, may well be regarded as both wholesome and pleasant.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE Paris Punch (Charivari) is poking the British lion between the ribs. A late cartoon shows old Lady Alliton, with her ridicule laid over her shoulder, leading her boy by the nause. Another old woman, smelling her, remarks that "Napoleon the Little is nothing during the days, and that why Lee is not muzzled. "Oh no!" says my lady, "it is quite unnecessary; the poor thing has not a tooth left."

A coaxed being asked by a judge "for whom he was concerned," replied, "I am concerned for the plaintiff, my lord, but I am employed by Mr. Featherbed."

"Wouldn't you call this the calf o' leg?" asked Bobpointing to one of his nether limbs. "No," replied Jim; "I should call it the leg o' veal."

LEGAL PROBLEM.—Find the amount of a judge's "charge" to a jury, and the "counterpoise" of the evidence. The answer to be given in "figures of speech."

"Mother," said a little girl, "I am forced to drink water; if I had water, I would drink wine." "Why, my daughter?" "Because it is the solution. It was the complaint of an Italian vineyard soon after a long drought, and an extremely hot summer, that had parched up all his grapes.

"Tom, you seem to gain flesh every day; the grocery business must agree with you. What are you made of?" "Well, Jim, I really forget now; but it strikes me it was a pound of sugar."

"I didn't think you would be so hard with me," as the shark said when he bit the anchor.

A lady correspondent, who assumes to know how boys ought to be brought up, writes to us among other items: "Oh, mothers! hunt out the soft, tender, genial side of your boys' nature." Mothers often do.—With an old shoe to the boy's benefit.

"See here, my friend, you are drunk." "Drunk, is he? Ah! I am glad to hear it. I had begun to fear you. You see my brother and I are on the temperance mission. He detests drunkards, and is a frightful example."

The man who smoked in bed on his wedding-night was successfully informed by his bride that "no gentleman ever lighted a cigar at the torch of love."

"Are you fond of Hogg's tales?" we ventured to ask of a gentleman the other evening. "Yes, I like 'em roasted, with salt and mustard," was the response. "No; but I mean, have you read Hogg's tales?" "No, indeed," said he, "not half so well as I like 'em. I don't think there is a rod one among them."

A musical gentle in Dunkirk, France, is educating a collection of poultry in music. He has already taught a beautiful drake to sing like a canary, and is now at work performing the "chanks, chanks" of a turkey into something of a sweeter sound.

THANKSGIVING-DAY IN THE ARMY.—AFTER DINNER: THE WISH-BONE.—[DRAWN BY W. HOMER.]

VIEWS IN AND AROUND MARTINSBURG, VIRGINIA.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

We have been at some pains to ascertain what instrument of the many now soliciting the public favor combines the greatest amount of real excellence. We have prescribed this inquiry entirely independently of aid or direction from interested parties. The opinions of some of the most musical critics, composers, and performers have been obtained; reports of experiments made in the ordinary use of various instruments in churches, schools, and families have been compared, all of which, with singular unanimity, concur in assigning the first place to the Cabinet Organ of Mason & Hamlin—a decision that corresponds with our previously formed convictions received from personal observations.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

PINEAPPLE CIDER,

Is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS.—The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. It is not better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick, than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctors' bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? For precious sickness use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the strength and give vigor and life to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one week, the first trial. He continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive of sickness to his fam. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for two years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $2 per bottle (full quart); pints, $2; 1 pints, $1. Quarts sent free by express on receipt of price. Freight on pints and 1 pints to be paid by the purchaser. Also for sale delivered to D. T. BABBITT, Sole Agent, 64, 66, 68, 67, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

CONSTITUTION

LIFE SYRUP,

COMPOSED OF

IODIDE POTASSIUM,

WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACTS OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY

WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,

Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup

HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the liberal-minded and scientific to results which have no parallel at the present day.

During the past few years we have contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as herculean as were ever encountered by any reformer.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick:" while others doubt their permanency, and think that incurable cases can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

This is our reply: In health the body, like a well-balanced scale, is in a state of Equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effects of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (scrofulary) Diseases transmitted from PARENT TO CHILD.

PARALYSIS.

It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the various forms of paralysis, that language would be redundant that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

INDIGESTION, WEIGHT OF STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, BILIOUSNESS.

SCROFULA,

STRUMA, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, TUMORS, SALT RHEUM.

This taint (HEREDITARY and ACQUIRED), filling life with untold misery, is, by all usual medical remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

[ARTHRITIS, LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, TIC DOLOUREAUX.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a sovereign, it is in Rheumatism and its kindred affections. Its most intense pains are relieved, and patients instantly alleviated—enormous swellings are reduced. Cases, chronic or viscous, of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by it.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, removing the Red Breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, like

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other difficulties of this kind, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both man and female, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever proved its equal.

Moth Patches upon the female face, depending upon a diseased action of the liver, are very unpleasant to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will restore the secretion, and remove the spot, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Liver, giving rise to Languor, Dizziness, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an ulcerated or cancerous condition of the Stomach accompanied with burning or ulcerative unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same disease. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD

Produces healthy men and women; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result. Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

The New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company has been organized under the laws of the State of New York, for the purpose of mining for petroleum, and other minerals, and dealing in the same. It has located its principal business office in New York City, the largest transit and shipping market for petroleum in the world, and has taken measures to establish a connection with Liverpool, the most extensive receiving market for that oil outside of this country. The managers and stockholders of the Company include among their number gentlemen largely interested in the petroleum business, and who have gained wealth and experience in it: facts which justify the confident expectation of careful, intelligent, and profitable management. It is believed that by a judicious investment of the capital of the Company dividends of from two to five per cent. a month on the capital stock can be made.

The lands now conveyed to the Company consists of the lands and property enumerated in the following list. Their extent can be greatly enlarged if desirable, and their present development completed, as funds shall come into the treasury.

List of Lands and Property.

FIRST.—One-tenth of the working interest in Lot No. 1, on the upper McElhenny Farm, containing ten acres There are three wells on this lot, two of which are now producing about fifty barrels a day each, the third about two barrels. A new well is also now in process of drilling, and will soon be completed. On this property are three good engines, tankage for over eleven hundred barrels, tubing, tools, office, &c.

There is room on this lease for several more wells; and all wells put down on or near this territory have been productive. The character of the McElhinny Farm is too well known to need further comment.

SECOND.—One-tenth of the working interest in Lot No. 6, on the lower McElhenny Farm, containing one acre, and known as the Hatch lease, being the one adjoining the well-known Empire Well, which is now producing about two hundred barrels a day. On this lot is one well flowing twenty barrels a day, and another well which has been flowing eighty barrels a day, and which is expected to yield again as soon as a "Torpedo," or oil-gauge, can be procured. This lot is nearly prepared. A third well is down and just ready to be tested. A fourth is down about four hundred feet, and is confidently expected to be a good well. There are three good engines, tankage, tubing, and office on this lease.

THIRD.—One-fourth of the working interest of two lots adjoining, on the late Widow McClintock's Farm, containing half an acre each, on which the property there is one well, known to us as the Freeman Well, now pumping twenty barrels a day; and another well, now drilling, which we expect to find a good supply of oil, being within a few rods of a well on the adjoining property which is producing one hundred and fifty barrels, and but a short distance from the celebrated "Noble Well," yielding three hundred barrels a day. A third well will be sunk immediately on this lease. Two good engines and all the necessary appurtenances are on this property.

FOURTH.—One-fifth of the working interest in the Caldwell Branch of Oil Creek, containing about one hundred acres, being the south half of that part of Lot No. 103, on the east side of the Caldwell Creek, about five miles above Titusville. The Kellogg Oil Company own the upper side of the creek, on which a well is now about to be put down. The surface show of oil on all this land indicates a very rich territory for boring purposes. The above named property this Company will push to immediate development.

FIFTH.—A lot of oil land in fee simple, containing seventy acres, situated on French Creek, about four miles from Titusville, and in full view of the Noble Well, the Shannon Well, and the Story Farm Wells, and is produced from with a few in the neighborood.

SIXTH.—A lot, in fee simple, of oil land on Cherry Run, containing about seventy-five acres situated about three miles above Plumer, and only two miles from the celebrated "Noble Well." All the land on Cherry Run has been purchased, and is held at high figures. Numerous wells are now being bored on this hundred feet, with a good show of oil on the adjoining lot.

SEVENTH.—One-eighth of the working interest in the "Wheeler Well," on the John McClintock Farm, containing one acre, more or less. One well is now producing about seventy barrels a day, and steadily increasing, and there is ample room for two more wells on this lot. There is an engine, tankage, and other property on the property, which is directly opposite the celebrated Hammond Well, now producing three hundred barrels a day.

EIGHTH.—One-fifth of the working interest in the Hamilton lease, about three acres on the Foster Farm, near the Porter, Crocker, Sherman, and Noble and Delamater wells.

NINTH.—One-fifth of the working interest in one acre of the G. W. McClintock Farm, adjoining the Mowbrey Well; with a good engine, one thousand feet of tubing, &c., &c. On this lot a well is now being put down, and will soon be completed and ready to pump.

TENTH.—One half of the interest in two acres of oil lands on Cherry Run. This locality is now producing a great excitement in the oil market, large streams of oil having been struck there within a month.

ELEVENTH.—Two acres of land on Oil Creek, about two miles below Titusville, a frontage on the creek of one hundred rods.

TWELFTH.—The Ridgway Farm, so called, comprising eighty-five acres of land near Titusville, having a front on Oil Creek of one hundred and fifteen rods, and having already upon it one well, which promises to be one of the very best on Oil Creek.

THIRTEENTH.—Two hundred acres of land, three miles above Titusville, with a front of three hundred rods on Oil Creek, known as the Sherman Farm. This land is undeveloped, and is by experts considered good property.

[N.B.—The three tracts last mentioned are considered very valuable for their location, being now heavily timbered, and containing water-power and mills now established, which at their utmost capacity are unable to satisfy the demand for the timber required for the development of the oil fields.]

FOURTEENTH.—One-half of the interest in two acres on the John McClintock Farm, known as the Buttonwood Lease. This lease is on Oil Creek, and has on it a well which will produce twenty barrels a day, and is now being put down two barrels a day, and No. 3 will produce twenty-five or thirty barrels a day as soon as the proper machinery can be set up.

FIFTEENTH.—One-fifth of the interest in two acres on the McElhenny or Funk Farm, near the Empire, Olmsted, and Dinsmore Wells. On this land one well is already down, and another is now being put down.

SIXTEENTH.—One hundred and sixty-eight acres of land in fee, on Bull Run, a tributary of Oil Creek.

SEVENTEENTH.—One hundred and eighty-five acres on Cow Creek, West Virginia.

[N.B.—The two last-named tracts of land have the true coal-measure formation, and are immediately adjoining oil territory of the best character, and which is now producing as much as any on Oil Creek.]

EIGHTEENTH.—Seventy-five acres in fee, near Franklin, Venango County, Pa., with a front of eighty rods on the river. This tract is now yielding coal for steam purposes, and already producing, and the machinery is now ready for tubing, with the necessary engines and fixtures.

NINETEENTH.—The Palmer Farm, containing one hundred and sixteen acres in fee, three miles from Titusville, extending for a hundred rods along both sides of Oil Creek, and being good oil land for its whole extent.

TWENTIETH.—Two hundred acres in fee, on Pithole Creek, four miles from Titusville.

TWENTY-FIRST.—One-sixth of the working interest, being one-twelfth of all the oil produced, on a lease situated on the west side of Cherry Run, on the Hammond Farm, and known as Lot No. 9. One well is already down on this land, the tubing and sucker-rods on the ground and paid for, and a good eight-horse engine on the premises.

With this extensive estate already secured to the Company, and with its advantages of membership and management, the property holds out every inducement for home and foreign capital. Before consummating the large number of Oil Companies now organized, the Petroleum business is, in fact, just at its beginning, as the following fact will show:

"Seneca Oil," as it is sometimes called even now in drug shops, used to be collected by the Senecas and other Indians from the banks of Oil Creek and springs in that region. The first organized effort to obtain oil in the field of the present Petroleum business was made by Colonel Drake, who sunk a well at Titusville in 1857, and in August, 1859, at 71 feet, the drill fell into a cavity, and the well began to yield 1000 gallons a day. The business instantly received a mighty impetus, and the history of the world presents no parallel to the promises, in commercial capital and activity, which the oil-fields of Northwestern Pennsylvania offered.

The Oil lands are found in Western Pennsylvania, Northern Ohio, and Southeastern Ohio, Northeastern Kentucky, and Western Virginia. Nearly all other new fields from time to time found. Throughout these regions for the last six years lands have constantly been sold from time to time, and fortunes made. The territory of the commercial value of Petroleum lands is not yet fully developed, rigidly as to supply, and the mark- ets about as near all that is furnished. The speed with which investments are trebled and quadrupled in Petroleum is without a parallel in the history of business. Philadelphia, and Boston, and Cleveland and fifty Petroleum Companies are in operation, and quoted in market reports, and that the Petroleum raised during the year in Western Pennsylvania alone will yield a million dollars to each man, woman, and child in the State.

In such enterprises to be early in the field is indispensable. Large as the number of companies may seem, it is not so either as the vast extent of oil territory or of their unknown subterranean treasures of oil. In a few years more, perhaps, some working limit to the business will be reached. Now, however, the New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company stands the unique position of offering the only chance to purchase stock at par, which will be produced from with a few years more, perhaps, some working limit to the business will be reached. Now, however, the New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company stands the unique position of offering the only chance to purchase stock at par, which will be produced from within a few those very few companies whose stock is practically out of market and inaccessible. With a view to provide for the future advantage of early subscribers, from this reasonable start in business, only a limited portion of the stock of the Company is offered at the present rates.

As one evidence of the opinions of experts about the quality of the property of the New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company, we copy the following paragraphs from a letter of Mr. Overley, an operative chemist of reputation, established at Titusville, and prominent in the oil business from its very beginning:

"W. T. PHIPPS, ESQ., Vice-President, &c.:

DEAR SIR,— "Titusville, Pennsylvania, October 10, 1864.

"I have observed that, without fail, the best wells have been reached in what was formerly the old bed of Oil Creek. The Drake Well, the Sherman Well, the Noble Well, and the Story Farm Wells are instances of this. Your lands here are mainly the Old Creek bottom. It is plain Creek is now diverted south of them, and in the summer the evolution of gas has been so effusive to the grass above that they have left them during mid-day for another part of the field. The Union Company's Well, not down to the third sandstone, in the same formation, gives a fourteen show of oil.

"If these are not the indications of oil territory, then only until after a series of wells has been actually sunk on the land can any opinion be formed. What the value of the land will then be you co. ledge; but the price will be beyond any present purchaser's means, I am satisfied. I can only add that I have no the interest of one cent in these lands, but say what I really think, and would invest my own money.

"Yours very respectfully, GEO. M. MOWBRAY."

$7 ARMY $9
WATCH.

A handsome engine-turned or plain sterling silver double case-plated Watch; double cases: English movement: fancy steel or gold cut escapement; open faced dial: new style of index; chain extra: polished case; self-acting balance; and reliable time-keeper. Especially adapted for army use. Price, $7 00.

A fine Hunting case gold plated watch, same as the above, in perfect running order, and a reliable timekeeper, sent free in a neat case for $9 00.

American Army Watch.

Imported by us expressly for the American Trade. In solid Oroide Gold—composite bearing cases (same pattern as superbly engraved, a massive plain case, the outer case being 18-carat gold, and the inner one solid gold composite); the two combinations being known as Oriole Metal, the imitation being so faithful that it can scarcely be detected from solid gold; and is beautifully engraved, and finished equal to a fine gold watch. It is fully believed recommended not only for beauty, but durability. It has the genuine European jeweled movement, (4 Tobias, Liverpool); improved ruby-setting; independent balance; patent regulator; fancy engraved dial; steel spirals and bands; fancy push-pin; lever-cap; and is warranted for one year. A single one sent free in a neat Morocco case, with a fine French curb vest chain, for $15 00.

Our stock consists of over 40 different styles of Gentlemen's and American Watches, of the latest and most reliable styles, for sale at the same trade discount of Jewelers. Levers in various styled cases: English Chain Lever; Hunting Silver and Glass Centre-Seconds Watches (counting save); Thermometer Watches, Magic Watches, Locket Watches, Repeating Watches, Chronometers, Duplex Watches, Officers' Watches, Photographic Watches, Independent Second Watches, Gold Chronometer, and various other styles. Some watches as low as $8 00. Also, Jewelry, Gold Chains, Single Watches, or dealing in them, should send a stamp for our descriptive circular. Address

WELCOMING BACK THE FLAG.

I PASSED two years—long, weary years—
Amid the traitor band
That trampled on our glorious Flag
Down in the Southern land.
I heard the shouts, as State by State
So nadly fell away—
Fell, as the stars from heaven shall fall
When comes the Judgment-Day—
Fell, as the wild angels fell
Who lost their thrones of light,
And now the sentence dread await
To everlasting night.

I saw the traitors' banner rise
Our own flag in the dust;
And whispered in my beating heart,
"Be patient, God in just!"
I saw the scornful rebel host
March by in all their pride;
And when I heard their boasts my heart
Almost within me died.
I saw that host come back again,
An army now no more,
But flying, scattered as the chaff
Of autumn's threshing-floor.

Then, pressing on the fleeing throng,
There soon burst on my view
A column strong of riders bold,
All clad in loyal blue.
Each foot the stirrup firmly pressed,
Each flashing blade was out,
I heard them shout: "Hurrah! hurrah!"
As victors only shout.
But nobler sight than flashing steel,
Than steeds or stalwart men,
I saw—and oh! I wept for joy—
My Country's Flag again.

Near Bunker Hill I first drew breath;
Then how could I forget
The lessons learned so near the spot
With Warren's blood once wet?
A woman—yet I waved my hand,
And "Welcome! welcome!" cried,
And felt, if need were, for that Flag
I freely could have died.
My dark-eyed darlings were by me, and
Through all life's weary track
They never will forget the day
We saw the Flag come back.

Oh! there are many in that land
Where flout the rebel "Bars"
Who mourn that old eclipse, yet know
That heaven still holds the Stars.
Between them and those shining worlds
The war-cloud rises black;
But peace will soon the cloud disperse,
And all the Stars come back.
God speed the day! for when it comes
The tears will fall like rain,
And thousands in the South will hail
The Old Flag back again.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1864.

SHERMAN'S MARCH.

THE campaign of General SHERMAN is striking and daring, but not more so than his advance from Chattanooga, of which it is a continuation. At Atlanta, with a slender line of railroad nearly two hundred miles long, exposed to the forays of the rebel cavalry, his position was uncertain. The advantages were not balanced by the risks. He had therefore either to useless for either party, and destroying as he goes, he carries a line of fire straight across the surface of the rebel section, cutting a terrible swath to the sea.

General SHERMAN does not play at war. "War is cruelty," he says, "and you can not refine it;" and he believes that the more fully we brought war upon the country will justly feel its sharpest edge. Yet he only is wise who sees in SHERMAN'S flashing sword the true olive branch. When the deluded Southern people feel that the Government is strong enough to pierce their armies where it will; that the national ranks can march and countermarch at their pleasure; that the shrewdest plans of their own Generals are outwitted and baffled; and those General perceive that they have lost their supreme military advantage of interior lines, a moral victory is won.

In many ways, as the rebels say, that the march of SHERMAN'S army is merely like the flight of an arrow which can not wound the air through which it passes. The rebel army moves close in behind him. The territory he crosses may still own the rebel sway; and he may hold only the ground upon which he actually stands. But the victory of such a campaign is not invisible. Not a rebel soldier may fall before him, but the hearts of a host faint within them. Not a field may be permanently held by him, but the rebel owner knows that the tenure of his own possession is loosened. The arrow may not wound the foe, but when you have learned that the air which you deemed impervious has been pierced by an arrow, you will hear a hurtling all the time.

SHERMAN'S campaign is one of great difficulties and dangers. The conviction of the rebels that, if they could embarrass or defeat him, their prestige would be regained, and their terrible disasters of the last year condoned, will incite them to the utmost effort of desperation to destroy him. It is the duty of all sensible Union men not to exult, not to be transported with excessive expectation, but to watch and hope and pray. All the circumstances—the absence of HOOD'S army, the blithe courage of SHERMAN'S men, his own indomitable energy and great genius—favor our noble General. We may justly believe that he will keep his Christmas by the sea. But we ought to guard against the possible consequence of undue elation. If, forgetting the chances of war, we insist that there is nothing but absolute success to be expected at every step of SHERMAN'S movement, we may find ourselves paying the penalty of our own folly in a depressing and overpowering reaction of feeling.

THE LATE PLOT.

THE plot to burn the hotels and create universal confusion utterly and even ludicrously failed. It might have been destructive of life and property as terrible as it was wanton. It was quite sufficient, however, to show the spirit of the whole rebellion. The "divinity" which starves Union prisoners to death, and suffers them to fall a prey to filth and vermin, consistently attempts to burn innocent women and children.

The enterprise is another illustration of the delights of State sovereignty which the rebellion professedly fights to maintain. We have, in the attempt of Friday night last, a fair intimation of what we are to expect when New Jersey and Vermont and Pennsylvania are independent powers between which and the independent empire of New York a quarrel chances to arise. And yet not quite so in the cases we suppose. If either of those States were a nation at war with another, war would not be conducted exactly in this "chivalric" method. It requires the imbruting of the spirit of a whole community by the custom of holding men and women as slaves before such fiendish malignity is developed.

But we can see in this plot the agreeable consequences of a possible war with "the Southern Confederacy," if that name should ever become a thing. "In the peace approach," as the rebels secure and sigh over war, will perhaps inform us how much blood and sorrow would be saved by patching up a truce with men capable of these things, instead of showing them that neither by such crimes, nor by the great wanton war which they have forced, can the Southern people ever succeed. The inevitable consequence of the plot will be a firmer purpose and a more unhesitating hand in striking at the heart of rebellion.

"SERFS."

THE Richmond Examiner, speaking of the significance of the late election, says, "It is the last plain that we must defend ourselves with all our force, or else sink into serfs; and we must stand together, or else sink together without a hope of redemption."

This is an illustration of the method by which the Southern mind is led astray. The Union is the cause. The South is vaguely called by the rebel leaders "our country," and submission to the equal laws of the United States is sinking into serfdom. And this is not politically true, for from the Administration—in other words, are the constitutional minority in this country serfs? If they are so regarded, how is it possible to go down to 1860 the rebel chiefs controlled this Government. Is it then so very unfair that, having by their own interpretation so long held the rest of their fellow-citizens as serfs, they should now take their turn?

But nothing is more amusingly false than such an assertion. It is the last device opium to prejudice and passion. In the year 1745 there was the last STUART rebellion against the British Government. It was suppressed by force, and the authority of the Government was restored. Were the Scots who took part in that movement or their descendants serfs? In 1794 Whisky insurrection was put down by WASHINGTON. Are the Western Pennsylvanians serfs? SHAY'S rebellion was overpowered and tranquility restored. Are the people of Western Massachusetts serfs? The attempt at forcible nullification in South Carolina was repressed. Have the South Carolinians been serfs ever since? If so, why have they regularly taken part in every election until they, with their friends, were defeated? Are not the descendants of PETER BROOKS was a serf raising his hand against his master? Have the men who lead the rebellion been until the year 1861 what GURTH was to IVANHOE, "thralls born and bred to the Saxon"?

The folly of such talk is transparent. If they were not serfs in the year 1859, when they acknowledged the government of the common country, how will they become such when they again acknowledge it? If a man resists the law, and the law is sustained, he is not a serf if he yields, when the penalty of the law is satisfied, and he returns to his equal allegiance with all other citizens, he is no more a serf than they. If JEFFERSON DAVIS was not a serf when he was Secretary of War under this Government, he can not be a serf when he is simple citizen under it; no, and he does not become a serf should he be executed for capital crime against it. Are the "Confederates" who are punished for offence against "the Confederacy" serfs? If they are not, neither are the "Confederates" who yield to the authority of the United States Government.

But they say it is not the Government of their choice. That maybe, but that is not a valid plea for resistance. The recently-elected President was not the preference of the city of New York. Is the city therefore a congregation of mere serfs because it peaceably accepts the result of an election in which it took part? There are whole sections of Georgia and North Carolina of which MR. DAVIS is not the choice for a leader. Does the Examiner consider them serfs because they do not accede and declare that their "country" will have nothing to do with the DAVIS tyranny at Richmond?

It is by this kind of frenzied and futile talk that the minds of the Southern people are excited. They are beyond reason now. Nothing remains but to destroy their military force, and to hold them as a child struggling with rage is held, until he falls exhausted, and his mind, gradually surmounting blind fury, begins to see the truth.

RAILROAD TRAVEL.

THE first point is safety. The road itself built in the best way, of the best materials, should be carefully and constantly watched, to ascertain when renewals of rails, sleepers, and bridges are necessary. Equal vigilance against accidents of running. There is but one way in which this care can be secured, and that is by the exaction of the sternest penalties for every accident.

A railroad is a pecuniary enterprise, and if imperfect construction and careless superintendence entail losses, the loss there will be adequate completeness and care. If, for instance, the Legislature of New York were now in session, and should decree a law that for every fatal railroad accident within the State the Company should be liable not only to the payment of damages in exemplary individual suits of the passengers, but should also pay a round sum into the State Treasury, so large that two or three penalties of the kind during the year would consume the profits of the road, there would be such a scrutiny of roads, such an organization of carefulness along the lines, as has never been known in the country, and railroad stock would ascend to a delightful value as a permanent investment.

When the rigors of the law are so sure that the mere sight of a doubtful-looking rail or an ancient sleeper appalls the switchman and the laborer with the fear that if it splits or breaks or rots their individual pockets will suffer, and with the fear of losing his life, but his dividend, we may be very sure that whatever human skill and foresight can do to avoid accidents will be done.

No Company, of course, should be held responsible for what it clearly could not help. For instance, we would not have it liable for the death of a passenger in the cars from apoplexy. That might be construed as a super-refinement of justice. And an ordinary Railway Commission there should be, which should strictly investigate all the circumstances of every disaster, large or small. Such Commission should have a suit against the offending road in the name of the State, and the extreme penalty should be exacted.

It is only in some such way that the public safety upon railroads can be secured and public confidence restored. The universal conviction now is that travel is becoming daily more dangerous, and that the Life Insurance Companies will soon excuse themselves from railroad risks. A stoppage upon the road, or an unusual movement in the cars, excites the most unpleasant emotions. Certain roads are viewed with peculiar apprehension, and men breathe more freely when they are safely at the end of them. The curious old speculations are revived that, according to the statistics of railway travel, every man will be killed a certain number of miles is liable to have his arm broken; a few more and his leg is in danger; and after a certain number of miles devoted his neck may be broken at any moment to keep the inexorable statistics straight.

Thus we mention the legend of the Minotaur, and thus, in the neatest and most becoming traveling dress, we expose Andromeda to the monster. It is only the form of the horror that changes. What is the essential difference between the annual sacrifice of seven fair youths and seven lovely maids of Athens to the insatiable brute of Crete, and the annual sacrifice of seven youths and maids of Baltimore, let us say, or New York, or Chicago, or St. Louis, to the insatiable locomotive Fate? We plume ourselves at our peril upon our superior civilization. The test of civilization is respect for human life and liberty.

Railroads are for the convenience of the people, and the people are fools if they do not take care, by law, that they shall not be the victims of the railroads. When the Central Road comes to Albany this winter and asks for favors, let the people grant them only upon fair and unquestionable conditions.

THE POLICE.

A SOBER, brave, or more skillful body of men than the police of New York does not exist. This great restless city lies safe in their protecting care. Firm, courteous, prompt, irresistible, they are a model band of citizens and officers. Their services in the draft riots of 1863 are already historical. Their efficiency in the late incendiary plot is not less memorable.

No men in the country fill more arduous and responsible positions than the Commissioner of the Board of Police Commissioners and Superintendent KENNEDY, and no men fill them more fully. Indeed the public knowledge of the singular sagacity and ability, with those of their associates, inspires a consciousness of security like the presence of an army.

No legislative act was ever more entirely vindicated by the result than the appointment of the Metropolitan Police. It should have been enough to satisfy every honest man that it was both just and desirable, that it was bitterly opposed by the then Mayor of the city. Not one of the ill consequences predicted has ensued. It has never been a partisan body or worked to party ends. The city has never been so safe, the rights of every citizen so secure, the method of police business so exact, comprehensive, and efficient as since the appointment of the Metropolitan Police. Their daily service is an incalculable benefit. There is no more honorable uniform than that they wear.

TRUTH-TELLING.

IF is amusing to see how a man in a passion lets the truth escape him. The London Times, which has constantly striven to reconcile the rebellion as the noble effort of an oppressed people to recover and defend their liberties, and has with pitiful sneers falsified every fact in the history of the war, unguardedly tells the naked truth in a late article written under the consciousness of the extremity of the rebel cause.

It is speaking of the project of arming the slaves at the South, and the Times innocently remarks: "The South has no reason to doubt that the people will fight just as bravely in support of the cause of slavery, which is the cause of the master, as he will in the cause of liberty." And it adds with particular fine feeling for the rebels: "The man who would submit without a murmur to the imprisonment of his horses or his property very likely shrink back with a species of superstitious horror from the attempt of his own Government [at Richmond] to deprive him of those very slaves for whom he has already thrown a long and desperate game."

This is as it should be. The Times confesses that this insurrection is an effort to save slavery; and the paper whose sacred principle is the fond "fair play"—the representative of the aristocratic governing class of England—deliberately re-echoes as a manly assertion of an undoubted right the armed effort of a body of men to overthrow a Government, which they do not pretend have ever wronged them, merely for the sake of preserving slavery. Does any really intelligent and thoughtful Englishman wonder that his country is detested by all other nations when he sees that its leading journal, holding a position which no other paper holds in any other country, is guilty of such a crime against human reason and civil society?

We do not for a moment forget the sympathy and generous service of our friends in England who, understanding the war, truly appreciate and despise the course of the Times and its adherents. But the fact of which we speak will help explain to them the indignation which they have seen and heard in America. England. They may be very sure that if the mine owners any where in England should revolt against the British Government for the sole purpose of more surely imbruting the unhappy miners, no American statesman in office would applaud their insurrection as the founding of a nation, as MR. GLADSTONE said of this rebellion; and if any leading newspaper here, clearly recognizing the object of the insurrection, openly supported it, it would be overwhelmed with the derision and wrath of the great body of the people.

BENEDICT ARNOLD REDIVIVUS.

THE following extract, from a late number of a valuable partisan journal, is in the style and spirit of BENEDICT ARNOLD'S sneers and the old Tory flings in the Revolution:

"Does any one suppose that a war which, with every successive month, grows nearer to the end that conducts it, when very disasters are turned to profit, and the bloodiest victories 'rolled into one,' only bring the end the more near up? No; it will be clung to just so long as it can be work at with profit by speculating managers."

The people of this country have just decided, by an immense majority and in almost every loyal State, to maintain their Government and the Union, and this extract represents the war to that end as conducted by a "cabal." It implies, moreover, that the war is both unnecessary and mercenary. The terms in which it describes a bloody struggle, forced upon the people of the United States by rebels who seized the national property, fired upon the national flag, and defied the national authority, reveal a total want of sympathy with the national cause, and the sour and malignant spirit of a defeated partisan.

Yet the papers and orators, who speak of this great unavoidable and truly sacred war as wicked and fratricidal, were the loudest supporters of the Mexican war and of the Seminole war, and have always carried a chip upon their shoulders begging Great Britain to knock it off. Thus they are not opposed to war in itself. They do not object to bloodshed. They do not grieve over disaster as such. Not at all. When they can conduct it, as they did the wars of which we speak—when they can coin the blood into dividends, where they can find profit in disaster, then, indeed, "war exists by the act of Mexico," then our honor imperatively requires that blood must be shed—the blood of savages whom we have stung into rage, the blood of a weak and wasted people whom we can bully.

But when our own fellow-citizens, fairly and constitutionally defeated in an election, fly to arms and overwhelm the country with all the untold horrors of sudden and diversified war, then to resist them, to try to save by the sword to which they appeal the Government, and civil order itself—to use the heroic darlings of every home following their high hearts and consciences to the field—to endure the strain of taxation—to face all the chances, present and remote, of so tremendous a civil convulsion, this is a struggle in which the whooping admirers of bibliktering and Mexican and Seminole wars can see nothing but fratricidal madness, and a war worked with profit by speculating managers.

The policy which this kind of carping represents brought this war upon the country, and every day shows that the people at last fully understand, and therefore utterly despise, BENJAMIN ARNOLD in whatever form he reappears.

THE CAMDEN AND AMBOY NUISANCE.

"BETWEEN the great cities of the Union, New York and Philadelphia," says a correspondent, "a single Company monopolizes the right of way across the State of New Jersey, and while refusing the privilege to every other Company, furnishes upon a single track road accommodations which in the people of any respectable village in the West would spurn with contempt."

In case of foreign war, as he truly remarks, the transmission of large bodies of troops and munitions between New York and Philadelphia would be practically stopped. There was, indeed, a time when the peaceful capitalists of Washington was threatened. The Camden and Amboy Road was found to be utterly inadequate to the transportation of troops across New Jersey. One of the new roads carried some thirty thousand soldiers, running trains by day and night; and the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company has brought a writ to compel the Raritan and Delaware Bay Company to pay over into the Camden and Amboy treasury the receipts for this service to the hurried Government.

To the State of New Jersey, notoriously controlled by this giant monopoly, no one man looks for redress. But a bill has passed the United States House of Representatives authorizing the use of other roads in New Jersey for lawful business, at their rates, and it only awaits the action of the Senate to make it a law. It ought to be entitled "A Bill for the relief of the Nation," and should be passed by acclamation at the earliest day. The Camden and Amboy monopoly has become a national nuisance.

CAMPS OF PRISONERS.

THERE is no doubt that there was a formidable plot at Chicago for the release of the rebel prisoners, and though them loose upon the city, abandoning it to the ravage of an immense armed and organized mob under the leadership of Morgan, a number of the rebel officers. The horror of such an event it is not easy to imagine, and we can well believe that the inhabitants of the city are still restless with the consciousness of the peril they have escaped. It will always remain as a proof of the odiousness of party-spirit that the prompt action of the Government to prevent the insurrection and the innocent men, women, and children, our neighbors and friends, from murder, wrong, and pillage at the hands of a drunken and infuriated rabble, was denounced by party newspapers as a reign of terror. Such a course was simply an appeal to the passions to which disloyalty was exposed, and from which it was happily saved.

But the circumstances should be very gravely considered, and ought to change the policy of the Government in regard to the disposition of prisoners. To establish an immense camp of prisoners in the immediate neighborhood of a great city, and close to all the dangerous elements in the population of every city, is to invite danger. Such a camp threatens the city. A sudden descent upon it by a few hundred determined ruffians, or the opening of the gates by stealth and treason, and the arming and release of the desperate horde to rage and ravage at their will, is not only easy but probable, and the revelations at Chicago are the proof of it. If prisoners are to be massed, it should be in some fort or upon a carefully guarded island, and not near a large town.

But whether the Government changes its policy in this respect or not, we hope that the spectacle of party malignity, which the Chicago plot produced, will be freshly remembered for the benefit of the country. To stigmatize the summary exposure and prevention of a massacre, with unspeakable horrors, as a reign of terror, a reign of terror inaugurated by the Government, compels the inquiry what these papers would have said of the plot if it had not been thus discovered. Would they have called it "a rising of the people," or "a great popular reaction," or "the people moving?"

The document which we take the name of the people in vain, who denounce "the Government" as if it were a tyrant above them instead of being the people themselves constitutionally expressing and executing their will, are enemies of the country and of human nature quite as dangerous as armed rebels, and a thousand-fold meaner.

RICHARD HILDRETH.

WE observe with the greatest regret a statement that RICHARD HILDRETH, the historian, who was appointed Consul at Trieste by Mr. LINCOLN, is hopelessly ill with a softening of the brain.

MR. HILDRETH is one of the quiet, patient, persistent, and efficient workers, who do less for their own fame than that of others. He belongs to that great body of unrecognized redeemers and authors who supply the hard-earned material upon which the brilliant few work, and insects, who invisibly construct the reefs upon which islands rise, in whose foliage the most brilliant birds soar and sing.

His history of the United States, from the settlement of the country down to 1821, fills six volumes, and is a monument of faithful labor and extensive research. It traces with clearness the steadily-progressive development of the great controversy which has been ended in civil war, and a body of political information quite unsurpassed. It is none the less valuable that MR. HILDRETH is a Federalist of the Hamiltonian school. A recent event only proves the distinction that HAMILTON was not altogether wrong in his estimate of the tendency of our system. The work has the evidence of labor; but it is clear and concise and honest, and is indispensable to the student of American history.

Luther will be remembered for several the same qualities of accuracy and thoroughness; and his long fidelity to the principles which brought the Administration into power four years ago has entitled him to more than ordinary appointment. We had hoped that his labors might be suspended and his health established in the mild climate of Italy; but if the news be true, MR. HILDRETH is under the heaviest and exhausted scholars by whose melancholy fate all hard workers with the brain should be warned.

CHARLES WESLEY'S POETRY.

One of the most striking features of the literary history of the last two or three years is the revival of hymn literature. The initial impulse seems to have been given by KEBLE'S "Christian Year," which, in other States, and in the Church shared in the movement, both in England and America. New editions of hymns, ancient and modern, have appeared with almost every year since 1850. Almost every school of Christian thought and feeling has given into the hands of the people its peculiar collections. The Lyra Germanica was followed by the Lyra Anglicana; the Lyra Eucharistica by the Lyra Messianica; and the Lyra Domestica by one to relieve closed that series. The less pretentious collections, under simpler titles, are too numerous to mention. Even the Unitarians have issued, not two or three as good enough to be cherished in the Church as permanent possessions.

It is a little strange that the best of these collections sound to be the work, not of any school or sect, but of lay-contributors. Even the late English lawyer, The Book of Praise, by SIR ROUNDELL PALMER, her Majesty's Solicitor-General, for excellence and comprehensiveness of catholicity, of spirit and in literary taste. It selects the best of old hymns and new, without reference to sect or party in the Church. The hymns of WATTS and WESLEY appear more frequently in its pages than in any other—proof at once of SIR ROUNDELL PALMER'S critical skill and of his freedom from sectarian prejudice.

It may appear that one of our New York merchants has devoted his leisure for years, like the British Solicitor-General, to studies in sacred song. Mr. CHARLES WESLEY DEMILLE has issued, in before us in a volume entitled "Sacred Poetry, selected from the Works of the Rev. CHARLES WESLEY, edited by a Lay Member of the Protestant Episcopal Church (New York: Kelley & Brother, 1864)." Such a collection has been necessary. The works of the executive critics have agreed, we think, in placing CHARLES WESLEY at the head of the Christian lyrists. It is recorded to the credit of WATTS, his contemporary, that he said he would give all he had written for the honor of being the author of WESLEY'S magnificent hymn, entitled "Wrestling Jacob." The London Quarterly calls WESLEY "the most sincerely inspired of the modern Church." JAMES MONTGOMERY, a cool poet and critic, declares that he "has celebrated the everlasting themes of Christian experience with an unction, affection and a splendor of coloring rarely surpassed." SIR ROUNDELL PALMER gives to the republics of a good hymn, "simplicity, frankness, and reality of feeling; a consistent elevation of tone; and a rhythm easy and harmonious, but not jingling or trivial." No writer has met these requirements more fully than WESLEY. A mere setting forth of Christian doctrine in verse does not constitute a hymn: the thought must be fitted to the needs of song; the hymn must be really lyrical, or it will not endure. Such hymns can not be made to order; they are the spontaneous product of Christian thought and feeling, working by and through the imagination. And in point of spontaneousness, poetic feeling, and harmony of numbers, CHARLES WESLEY is, of all hymn writers, facile princeps. Batches of the dry stuff called hymns by the thousands who never heard his name. The highest test of poetry, according to COLERIDGE, is that "we resolve to it." And the hymns of WESLEY stand this test to perfection.

The literary and Christian public will thank the editor of the beautiful volume before us for his labor of love. It contains the cream of CHARLES WESLEY'S poetry—not merely the hymns given in the ordinary books, but many others that have never before appeared. The form of the work, as to typography and binding, is equal to its matter. No more beautiful gift-book for the holidays has appeared; and in this way it will, we trust, reach hundreds of families. And all who examine the book, and can appreciate it, will rejoice that MR. THOMAS MCMILLEN'S years of leisure have been so gracefully and profitably employed.

TO THE SANITARY COMMISSION.

THE following letter suggests that the Commission shall extend their business. But we are very confident our correspondent will see that to suggest nothing less than that the Sanitary Commission shall become the great army sutler, and that it has been established for the sole purpose of making it Private ——— and all other victims could be relieved of the extortioners, but he must try again to devise a satisfactory method:

"CLUB OF DISCOUNTED NEB, NEAR THE FRONT, Friday, Nov. 25, 1864.

"DEAR SIR.—None can so truly appreciate the labors of the Sanitary Commission as do we who are their beneficiaries in camp and field. Their labors are gigantic, and at first sight it would appear unjust to seek to tax their operations additional; but if you will allow me a kindness to be compensated, I hope the proposition made will commend itself.

"Sutlers, as they now exist among us, are a sort of necessary evil. They charge us exorbitant prices for every little luxury the soldier can get, and one of their principal current would rival any yet given from rebeldom. Take the following prices current: Eggs, 75 to $1 25; cured potatoes, 15 cents per pound; cheese, 60 cents; onions, 15 cents; source sweet-oil, 30 cents; butter, 60 cents—and every other thing in proportion. Now what we want is that the Sanitary Commission shall be sold if labor so far as to furnish the few articles we want at compensating prices. Get the Christian Commission were to do this, they would find the Gospel of the Prince of Peace. This would require but an additional department, and would be under the management of a small army of clerks. These clerks should be discharged sergeants and officers, when qualified once to be had.

"Please make the suggestion, and oblige many victims.

"YOURS, PRIVATE ———."

FOR THE SOLDIER'S CHILD

THE New York State Volunteer Institute was established about eighteen months since at Soquenon Bridge, Westchester, New York, to furnish a home for and to educate the sons of dead or disabled officers and soldiers, and if funds enough can be raised, it will become a National institute of a State institution. It is a military school, but it provides for the education for any honorable pursuit.

The appeals to public charity for projects connected with the war have been so many, and the manifold duties of the citizen to the soldier have so largely increased, that the promoters now propose to relieve those who wish to aid the institute link by charging a small sum to a portrait. That they may furnish shelter, food, clothing, and a liberal education to the children under their charge they ask fifty thousand subscriptions at two dollars each, for which every subscriber will receive a fine steel engraving of each of the President, General GRANT, or any corps commander, and also a certificate representing a share in the distribution of real estate in and near the city of New York to be made on WASHINGTON'S birthday, February 22, 1865, the profits to be devoted to the benefit of the Volunteer Institute.

We are informed that the institution has the approval of General HOOKER, Governor SEYMOUR, the late General CASEY, and Mr. ERCK, Superintendent of Public Instruction. The President is Mr. H. T. HAINES, and the Treasurer Colonel H. R. RANDALL, P. O. box 4262, New York city.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN

DAVIS, Sherman has reached the sea on his way expect us to hear of important results in progress. The rebel Journals will not afford us and comfort to the enemy's people. But from various sources of information to which we may be assured that he has not met with no reverse. This much appears to be certain, that he started on November 14 in two columns on the line of the two principal railroads that run from Atlanta to the sea—Macon and Savannah—and that his advanced cavalry has taken Milledgeville, which lies between the two routes above mentioned.

These two railroads are the Georgia Railroad, which runs directly from Atlanta to Augusta, and thence to Savannah River, and the Macon and Western Railroad, which runs from Atlanta to Macon, and thence to Barnesville, and then takes an eastward course through Macon to Savannah. From Atlanta to Macon is 194 miles; from Macon to Savannah 180 miles. Sherman's orders for the march were issued November 9. The right wing, consisting of the Fifteenth and Seventeenth Corps, was to be commanded by General Howard, and the left, consisting of the Fourteenth and Twentieth, by General Slocum. Each regiment to be reduced to three and one ambulance, and each brigade a due proportion of ammunition and provision wagons and artillery. Each soldier to carry specially all the country during the march, each brigade having its foraging commander and foraging party. Fifteen days' provision aboard and three days' forage. No destruction of property to be permitted when the army is unmolested, but in districts which offer resistance a devastation to be made more or less relentless, according to the measure of hostility. Able-bodied negroes may be taken, unless there should be a scarcity of supplies. It is probable that to General Sherman's cavalry will be committed the necessary destruction of railroads, while the infantry will move steadily onward to the new base of operations.

On the 16th General Beauregard issued a manifesto to the citizens of Georgia, calling upon them to rally around Governor Brown, to obstruct the roads in Sherman's front, to cook, and rear, and presidingly to be with them. The latter promise he appears, from the late Macon papers, to have redeemed, by leaving Hood to fight Thomas in Central Tennessee.

THE SHENANDOAH.

A cavalry reconnaissance was undertaken November 21 by Brevet Brigadier-General Duffié, under General Torbert. The enemy was found strongly intrenched at Fisher's Hill, on the North Fork of the Shenandoah. Here an engagement took place, which resulted in the enemy's abandoning, was repulsed; but it was ascertained that Kershaw's Division had left the Valley for Richmond. On the same day Duffié's Division made a reconnoissance toward Front Royal.

EAST TENNESSEE.

General Breckinridge, after his defeat with Burbridge on the banks of the Holston in West Virginia, proceeded to the Virginia and East Tennessee, where about the middle of November he effected a junction with Vaughan's force, then marched against General Gillem, who had had his victory over Vaughan and a pursuit of the latter to Bristol, Gillem, base on Bull's Gap, where he was receiving reinforcements. On the 12th, leaving turned Gillem's position at Breckinridge, with Vaughan and Duke, made an attack a little after midnight, and succeeded in completely routing his left and left his left in full flight. Gillem then fell back to Strawberry Plains, where, with the brigade under Holston, the enemy's advance was checked. Burbridge has been sent to Cumberland Gap to prevent the rebel force from falling into the enemy's hands.

GENERAL THOMAS'S CAMPAIGN.

General Thomas evacuated Pulaski November 23d; and the rebel General Hardee, Hardee's corps, was close on the enemy's pursuing. Our forces fell back first to Columbia, which was reached and made by the rebels more than to Franklin, which is only twenty miles south of Nashville. Here Schofield was left to fall back on his first reinforcements.

The circumstance lately made by our gun-boats up the Tennessee developed the fact that the river was lined with rebel batteries as completely as the Yazoo. The district was under the command of the rebel General LOVELL. Hood's army was reported by deserters and scouts to be 80,000 strong, with 32 guns.

THE PLOT TO BURN NEW YORK.

On the night of November 25 a band of conspirators, under rebel auspices, attempted to execute their long-threatened plot to fire the city of New York. By the interdiction of the conspirators to set fire to all the principal hotels, and to the shipping in one line of docks, and on the other destruction of Broadway, while at the same time the Academy of Music and other places were to be set on fire, become a matter of distracting alarm. If the plot had been successful, there was reported by deserters and scouts to be 80,000 strong, with 32 guns.

"THANK GOD!"—RECEPTION OF OUR EXCHANGED PRISONERS ON BOARD THE "ELIZA HANCOX," NOVEMBER 18, 1864.—SKETCHED BY WILLIAM WARD.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

SERVING OUT RATIONS TO OUR EXCHANGED PRISONERS ON BOARD THE "NEW YORK."—[SKETCHED BY WILLIAM WAUD.]

OUR EXCHANGED PRISONERS

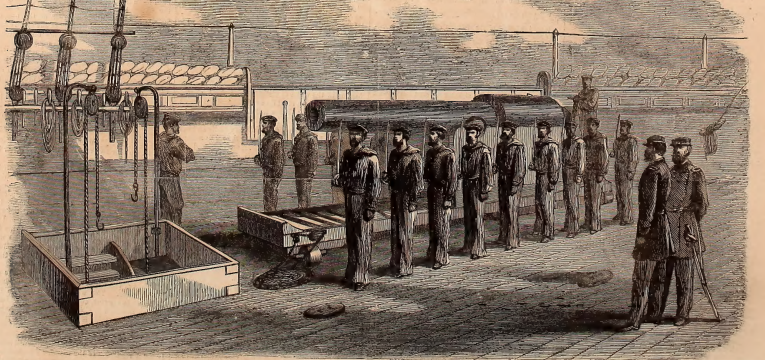
No more touching scene has occurred during the war than that which glorified the deck of the Elm Hancox, Colonel MULFORD'S dispatch boat, on Friday, November 18, and which we illustrate on page 786. On that day we began to receive from the rebel authorities those of our exchanged prisoners who were in the best condition for removal. Shouting and cheering, they step on deck under the protection of the old flag. To these few the prisonpens of Andersonville have become only a remembrance, except in so far as the terrible record of the life there lived is written in their gaunt faces, scurvied limbs, and exhausted strength. The link which has bound them to the horrors of the past is broken, though it has left its scars and lacerations on their limbs. No words can describe the exultation of these long-sufferers at their release. Scrofulous cripples throw away their crutches and walk erect with the inspiration of simple joy; men who by want and home-sickness have been brought to the verge of idiocy, or been smitten for months with almost hopeless melancholy, shout for the old flag and for Colonel MULFORD, and, regardless of the presence of their rebel companions, sing,

"Rally round the flag, boys,
From near and from far,
Down with the traitor,
And up with the star!"

Nor is it easy to describe the good cheer inherent in plenty of hot coffee and boiled hams for men who for months have been literally starving in a country abounding with provisions. We have on this page illustrated the scene on board the New York as the rations of ham and coffee were served out to the prisoners. To the luxury of palatable food is added that of the bath and of clean, new clothes.

The number of prisoners already exchanged is twelve hundred and forty-six. According to late advices the exchange was interrupted on account of the damaged railway communications on the line of SHERMAN'S march. We hope that SHERMAN will compensate for this by redeeming all our prisoners at Millen. The prison-camp at Andersonville was almost entirely vacated early in November; east of Milledgeville a few miles is "Camp Lawton," which it is not improbable that our cavalry has reached. The stockade at Millen contains several thousand of our prisoners; and there are a large number in the hospitals at Savannah. The largest prison-camp in the rebel States is at Florence, about one hundred miles from Charleston, in the northeastern part of South Carolina; here, within the space of thirty-two acres, sixteen thousand prisoners are confined.

At Andersonville there were, a few weeks ago, from twenty-five to thirty thousand prisoners. So dreadful was the pestilence engendered from the close contact of the men, from filth, and from starvation, that eleven thousand of these were thrown unconfined into the trenches around the stockade. Then, when inhumanity itself shuddered at its own extravagant malice—when even the rebel surgeons protested and uttered complaints which more than bear out the statements which we have received from returned prisoners—then the prison was broken up and the prisoners dispersed. The regulations and treatment of the prisoners at Florence are similar to what they were at Andersonville, and the mortality nearly as great. It must be remembered that every feature of this barbarous and inhuman treatment was unnecessary. Our prisoners could have easily been supplied with food, for the Southern people are not suffering for the want of subsistence; the only difficulty has been that of transportation, and this had no application to the region in which our prisoners have been confined. Nor was there need of suffering from nakedness or insufficient warmth; the former we ourselves would have promptly relieved if the opportunity had been given, and the latter could easily have been relieved by the plentiful supply of pine wood in forests immediately surrounding the prison-camps.



SUNDAY MORNING INSPECTION ON BOARD THE GUN-BOAT "METACOMET."—SKETCHED BY GEORGE WATTERS.—[SEE PAGE 790.]

ALLATOONA.

DISMOUNTED from his horse,
On the summit of the hill,
Stood our gallant General CORSE,
And he stood erect and still.

He could see them far below,
From the summit where he stood,
He could see them come and go,
All the rebels under HOOD.

Under all the far-off trees
He could see them form their lines,
They were gathering like bees
Beneath the oaks and pines.

And the hero watched them now
As a man may look on death,
With a clouding of the brow
And a quickening of the breath.

For the traitors were a host
That hourly swelled and grew,
And around him at his post
The loyal men were few.

Then heavenward looked he,
And a prayer was in his eyes,
But the banner of the free
Waved between him and the skies.

And the blue of heaven was blent
With the stars, as if, just then,
Twas an answer God had sent
To the leader and his men.

Up the hill the flag of truce
With its folds of dingy white,
Came as if it could assuage
Our Great Captain the fight.

And the message that it brought
From the rebel in the wood
Was as if a coward wrought
As a scribe for General HOOD.

"Now yield to our strength,
Ere we come with might and main,
For yield ye must at length,
And the bloodshed will be vain."

On the flag gazed General CORSE,
As in thought, but not in doubt;
Then he leaned upon his horse,
And he wrote this answer out:

"Ye may come when'er ye will,
Ye may come with might and main,
I will answer for it still
That the bloodshed is not vain."

Back, underneath the trees,
Went the flag of truce, and then,
Like clouds of climbing bees,
All the valley swarmed with men.

No pen can paint the strife,
Nor the long and desperate fight
When we gave life after life
For our flag and for the right.

We saw the false ranks reel,
And all the bloody morn
They sank beneath our steel
Like newly-mowed corn.

Bleeding and faint our chief,
But watching still, he stood,
With a smile of grim relief,
The retreating ranks of Hood.

And he murmured, "I mourn the dead,
And bless the powder like rain,
But 'twas true as truth that I said,
It should not be shed in vain.

UNION REFUGEES.

WE give on our first page an illustration representing UNION REFUGEES AT KINGSTON, GEORGIA, on their way North. The number of these arrivals is daily increasing. Since SHERMAN with the main body of his army entered southern and southwestern Northern Georgia, this region has become one not very safe and pleasant to those who have by the presence of our army been emboldened to declare their preference for the old Union. The Richmond journals tell us that the population of these localities with peculiar satisfaction, on the ground that it diminishes that opposition in Georgia which has always been an element of danger to the Confederacy.

INSPECTION ON BOARD THE "METACOMET."

WE have frequently given illustrations of the inspection of our land-forces. We give our readers this week on page 789 a representation of the crew and guns of the gun-boat Metacomet at their Sunday morning inspection. The Metacomet belongs to Admiral FARRAGUT'S Gulf Squadron, and mounts ten guns, some of which appear in the sketch. This is one of our lately-built gun-boats, having been in commission during the last year only. She took a prominent part in the capture of the forts in the fight with the Tennessee in Mobile Bay last August.

FRONT AND REAR.

THE interesting sketch which we give our readers this week on page 786 represents a curious but saddening feature of the battle-field. Look at the picture of the battle at the front, where our poor soldiers, battling for the country—their and ours—are risking precious lives, are suffering from severe, if not mortal, wounds, and their blood stains the contested field. Turn them from this picture and look to what is going on in the rear. Here, under shelter of heavy wagons, are teamsters and rutlers, and other non-combatants, playing cards, or engaged in other amusements, as regardless of what is going on a few rods distant at the front—what games contested or what problems solved—as if they were congregated together at a fair. Between the mimic strife in the rear and the exciting game at the front how short a space, but a contrast of what opposites!

THE STONE RIVER MONUMENT.

THE Stone River battle-ground is in the vicinity of Murfreesborough, Tennessee. Indeed the battle there fought is frequently called the battle of Murfreesborough. The battle was fought on the last day of 1862 and the second day of 1863, and was one of the most severely contested on record. Our force, under General ROSECRANS, numbered little more than 40,000, while General BRAGG commanded an army of over 60,000. Our loss in killed amounted to 1500, in wounded to 7245; the total loss being twenty per cent. of the army engaged. The fighting really lasted three seven days, and resulted in our occupation of Murfreesborough. No more gallant fighting was ever done than by our army at Stone River, and it is fitting that over the resting-place of so many brave heroes should be erected this memorial of soldierly fellowship and of popular gratitude.

CAPTURE OF THE "HOPE"

WE illustrate on page 797 the capture of the blockade-runner Hope by the United States steamer Quaker city on the morning of October 22. The vessel was chased out from the bar of Cape Fear River and captured after a run of five hours. She was one of the fleet of the fine old blockade-runners; she was built in Liverpool in 1864 at a cost of £50,000. Her crew numbered sixty-eight men. She was built of steel, and her engines are from the Victoria Iron Works. She is 400 feet long, 40 feet beam, and 11 feet 300 English measurement. Every thing about the ship at the time of its capture was in an excellent condition. Her cargo also was valuable. The Zalka is a small boat intended for a sea-going vessel, presenting a great contrast to her prize, which is a powerful ocean steamer. She has since captured the Lizzie Stirling, bound from Wilmington to Nassau, with 900 bales of cotton.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE END OF TABLE-TURNING.—An inmate of a lunatic asylum, driven mad by Spiritualism, wishes to try to turn the multiplication-table.

A CANINE EPITAPH.

"I say, old fellow, what are your politics?" said one friend, quizzing another. "Conservative; my father was Conservative," he replied. "And I was born religious" continued the other. "Protestant; and my father was Protestant," was the answer. "And why are you a bachelor?" said the other. "Because my father was a—sir, confound it! Bachelors will be bachelors, I suppose."

CAUTION TO IMPOLITE BACHELORS.

A lady of our acquaintance, whose temper is not generally considered to be of the best, was lately visited by a gentleman. The incautious young man failed to admire a new bonnet she had on. Mad as a March hare. She told herself out for his capture, successfully—we regret to say —and now that poor man has only been heard to admire her bonnets, but, worse than all, to pay for them!

TOO LITERAL.

CHITTENDEN (who has been long waiting). "I say, waiter, how long will the steak be?"
WAITER. "About four inches and a 'arf, Sir!"

A QUESTION FOR OUR HOUSEKEEPERS' BOOK.—Why is a lady preserving fruit like one of the West Indian Islands?—Because she becomes a Jam-aker.

A chiropodist in Paris commences his puff with these words: "All the world has corns; the forest, bobtail, but! Rosso doubles had corns; Judas had, probably, and you, ladies and gentlemen, need not blush to expose your feet to the operator."

WHY is Shylock a most difficult character to perform?—Because it is almost an impossibility to do a Jew.

BEEF TEA.—A venerable Scotch divine, who in his day and generation was remarkable for his primitive and simplistic mode of life, at length fell sick, and was visited by a kind-hearted lady from a neighboring parish. On her proposing to make some beef tea, he inquired what it was, and being informed he promised to drink it at his next dinner-hour. The soup was accordingly made in the most approved manner, and the lady went home, directing him to drink a quantity every day until her return. This occurred a few days afterward, when the lady was surprised to see the beef tea almost undiminished, and to hear it pronounced by the worthy clergyman a most excellent thing to had ever tasted. She determined to try it herself, and having tasted a small quantity, pronounced it excellent. "Ay, sir," quoth the divine, "the tea may drink well enough that way, but try it wi' the sugar and cream as I did!"

THE FRIEND OF A COAT.—A rich manufacturer at Solon, whose last remarkable bankruptcy, went to a celebrated tailor at Paris to order a coat. He asked the price. "A thousand francs," said the tailor. He thought the tailor had "If I shall furnish my own cloth," he said. "Just as you like," was the reply of the tailor. The coat having been made, the manufacturer naked what he had to pay for the making. "A thousand francs," was again the reply of the tailor. "But I furnished the cloth." "Sir," said the tailor, "I never reckon the cloth; I always give it into the bargain."

"I'VE ESCAPE."—When it breaks out.

WHY is gas like poetry?—Because it is always found in metre.

Upon a traveler telling General Doyle, an Irishman, that he had been where the bags were so large and powerful that a few of them would form a man's height on the level, the General quietly replied, "My good Sir, we have the same animals in Ireland, but they are called Jackasses."

"CHILDREN," said a considerate mother to her assembled progeny, "you may have every thing you want, but you mustn't want any thing you can't have."

"SO you are going to teach school?" said a lady to her modest young friend. "Yes, madam, sooner than do that I would marry a widower with nine children." "I would prefer that myself," was the quiet reply; "but where is the widower?"

WANTED.—The receipt which is given when a gentleman says "pays his respects."

A country clergyman was a good deal astonished one day by the jollity of the mourners at a funeral "a breakfast," said an old gossip, and in explanation, "Bless you, Sir, they're only dissembling their grief."

THE BELLE OF THE VILLAGE.

"AH! it's a nice thing to be the belle of the village; to sit behind the little street with a quiet, independent air, and feignedly unconscious that all the marriageable girls are looking out with envy; and then at the door, every tripping along toward the sea-shore, pretending not to see Fred Wilson, the young farmer, as he half reins in his stout colt to bow to the passers, and is waylaid by the retiring waves for an hour on the hard, firm sand, with a little coquettish nose poked up and upon the top of those wanton tresses, floating down and half-covering a charming little figure, every golden hair being a very chain to entangle poor hearts at every turn.

Not a but sollitary but the an old bachelor of five-and-forty, down by the sea-side for the benefit of his health and to get rid of his money, wondered. I had just turned out of my lodgings, and was following in the wake of the fair craft, Amy Ellis—when at Rome we must do as the Romans do; and being in a fishing village full of amphibious farmers, I of course, as a discontent upon me to follow sea-faring, which of course I did very badly and out of place. I was soon down upon the sands among the shingle, dog-fish, sea-eggs, star-fish, and jelly-fish, and the stranded shells of many a shipwrecked cockle.

I was very much surprised upon reaching the shore to find that Fred Wilson had made a circuit, and crossing the sand-banks, had reached the spot where Amy was walking, and, followed by her side, leading his horse by the rein. The sight put me in mind of a picture of years ago, when I used to go down to gambles, and wild-flower gathering, and I felt rather lonely as I thought of years slipped by, never to return, and of the old days, and looking for one child to sea at the pallid rising moon, I had gone into a deep fit of musing, living the past over again, and thinking of the future, when my right hand, as I thought was broken by the heavy thud, thud of Fred Wilson's horse as he scattered up to me. In a minute he pulled up at my side, and I was about to ask after Amy when I saw the last flutter of her ribbons, and the last wave of her hair as she stepped lightly through the gap in the sand-bank. Something was evidently wrong, for Fred was looking most fearfully blue. He was a favorite of mine, for I used to set him down as the beau-ideal of a bluff young Saxon farmer, and by way of cheering him up, I pressed him to sup with me, perhaps rather selfishly, for it would help to cheer me up, too.

I could see plainly enough what was the matter, and I had to use a great deal of persuasion before I could gain his consent; but I carried my point, and an hour afterward we were chatting over the fire, smoking some capital Havanas which I had brought down with me, and drinking some brandy-and-water, the essence of which had never paid duty, and under whose influence Fred had become communicative. He was in love, and Amy was a jilt—a flirt; he was half mad, he said, and nothing could give him any satisfaction but breaking the heads of Harry Henderson and a few others. But he would not do that; he would leave the place for good, that he would.

And so days and weeks rolled by, and my stay had almost reached its fullest limits.

I had only another day to spend at Delathorpe, and felt rather reluctant to part from the quiet village and the hospitable friends I had met with. I felt, too, that I should regret much the salt-sea breeze which had given me back my health—rich peat peat that the sea can produce. My last day was a fête day—at Delathorpe Dancing," a day annually looked forward to as the reunion of friends and relations. The parties in some of the farm-houses rendered rather strongly, and it fell to my lot to be under the same roof as Amy Ellis and Fred Wilson. Cross purposes were rife; flirting was in the ascendant, and a dark cloud hovered over Fred's brow, growing blacker as the evening wore on.

At last, tired of the heated room, I made my escape to enjoy an evening walk upon the water, and had hardly reached the intervening bank when I started at a heavy hand was laid upon my shoulder, the thick sand having muffled the footsteps of my follower. I found on turning that it was my young friend Wilson, and I could just see by the dusky twilight that he were my thing but a pleasant aspect. I knew his complaint so well that I would not revert to it, but walked out with him over, and, lighting up, we climbed the sea-bank and sat down in silence. It was a warm, close, heavy autumn night, thick with mist and vapor, and the darkness was fast closing round. The sullen wash of the water upon the shingle, the constant heavy roll of the waves upon the shingle aided to the drowsiness of the evening, while a sighing breeze, which kept coming in fitful gusts and dying away again, served to my shore-going weather-wisdom to portend a storm. As the waves broke upon the shore their sound seemed, as it were, to fill up the superabscent light were the appearance of the tail of some huge rocket rushing along the sands. Fred's thoughts were evidently with the pretty one left, and he smoked on in silence, while I watched this peculiar phenomenon with interest. At last I broke the silence and said, "It not this very much like a storm coming on, Fred?" But before he could reply a rough voice at my elbow exclaimed, "Storm it is, and as sure as guns; glass has been going down ever since one o'clock, and what with this fancy tide and the low land's coming on, we reckon we shall have the bank pretty well shaved before morning."

Our informant was one of the revenue men, who, with his glass under his arm, had come up unobserved and given us the unasked benefit of his opinion on the weather. He touched his hat and walked on, and we could just see that he was buying himself with striking up the top spar of the coast-guard, which stood on the highest part of the sand-bank.

"Tell you what," said Fred, "there's a row coming on, or else old Snodger would never be letting down the flag-staff, for he doesn't do that for a capital of wind. It's odd, too, you were saying you would like to see one of our storms, and now it is coming the very night before you leave; for come it will, that's certain. If old Snodger sees a storm a brewing'd you may depend upon seeing the yeast cone flying over the nine-hills. By Jove! what a bluff! he continued, as a sudden gust nearly took his cap off.

"Well, I really should like to see one of the storms you describe," I said; "and, in my present mind, and bodies washing ashore for days after, but a storm without injury to life or property; for indeed there is something majestic in the warring of the elements—the rushing winds, the sounding floods, the rolling whole-bit one the tempest, the artillery, and the vivid flashing of the arrowy lightning. There is something to my mind intensely grand in the war of the elements, Fred."

"Yes, very," said my companion, dryly; "very poetical, no doubt; but, as in this case, intensely disagreeable. If you will take my advice, you'll come with me from among these pattering drops, and try to find a little more pretty indoors."

"Not for worlds," I exclaimed; "that's the most sensible speech I've heard you make lately. I believe you are growing into the true character, and are going to give a manly tone to the bent of your feelings."

This was a signal for further conversation without doors, for the rain was beginning to stream down, and the wind bowling in fitful gusts over the "watry plain." We descended home, and with cigars, coffee, chocolate and cigar, retired to my bedroom. Upon closing the casement, I could tell that the wind had much increased; but the darkness and rain proved themselves insuperable obstacles to my leaving the house by any stormy-going path, which the wind was not sufficiently high to create the "mountains high" waves that would satisfy the desire of my friend Fred Wilson on the sea-coast.

Sleep fell softly on my eyelids—one of the great blessings of the sea and sea-air—and I remember no more.

The wind rushing by the house lulled me to my rest, and I was soon in the land of dreams, or rather in that deep, sound repose where waking banishes the sleeping workings of the brain.

I must have slept for some time when a sudden noise, that seemed to my waking senses like thunder, roused me with a start, and I listened anxiously for a repetition of the sound. I looked toward my window, but every thing seemed of pitchy blackness, and for a time the startled pulsation of my heart, with its heavy throb, throb, was all that could hear, beyond the furious wind which was now raging fearfully, making the house rock to its very foundations. Ever and anon there would be a lull, as when I first awoke, and then again the cascades would rattle and the blast shriek by. Suddenly a flash illumined my room for an instant, there was a pause of a second or two, and then the loud boom, as of a gun, reverberated round the house. At first I took it for thunder, but my collecting thoughts told me it was a distress signal. I turned out of bed and hastily dress-d, and on going to the window I could see that there was a fire on the shore. Directly after a vivid blue light shone out seaward, and by its glare I could discern some thick black mass in the distance. It was now plain enough to me that a vessel was on the coast, for they bore but na ill reputa, and I had heard more than one tale of their fatality.

On descending the stairs I found my landlady up, and comforting herself with a cup of coffee, and from her I learned that the wife of the pilot was on the shore, for a large vessel had come on the sands. Resisting the old lady's persuasions to have a cup with her, I was soon to the beach, and on passing the opening in the bank was for a time dazzled by a large fire upon the sands, which was blazing up and roaring beneath the violence of the wind, and lighting up the assembled crowd. Where the vessel lay all was intensely black, for the light of the fire was not pierce to her, but the foaming waves, as they rolled over and tumbled with fearful violence upon the beach, seemed to reflect the fiery beams in vivid flashes.

People were running to and fro, excitedly giving orders which no one executed; the men-of-war's men tried again and again, but the men could not get any communication with their rope to the vessel, and if they could have done so the distance would have been very doubtful, as the sea had risen to a fearful height. Another flash, and the mainmast of the vessel sent a thrill through the breasts of those who burned to render aid, but were helpless; and a dull struck by my heart as I thought of the dire straits of my fellow-creatures. An excited crowd on my left then took my attention, and I reached the spot to find the life-boat being dragged rapidly down in its track, but could not be manned. Most men shrank from encountering such a sea, and those who would have dared it were dragged back by wives or mothers, half frantic with fear. It was a never-to-be-forgotten scene: the roar of the sea and waves was deafening; here and there they threw up cash, spar, or plank, only as it were, to pounce upon it as it was sucked back with fearful force, and as they came racing in, chasing one another till they arched over and broke in cataracts upon the sands, drenching us with the spray. For the same tearing by with redoubled fury, and as straw, fagots, and driftwood were piled upon the fire, the sparks and flames rushed in a stream landward, and blazed up afresh upon the wild scene. On nearing the boat I was well earnestly talking to the men, and in reply to my inquiring look an old man shouted in my ear that half the crew were not fit to go from "the drink" and they would volunteer.

All at once a light form with streaming hair rushed up to Wilson and clung wildly to his arm, and, as I stood by his side, Amy exclaimed, "But you will not go, Fred? Oh, tell me you will not be so mad." Then she paused as she perceived me standing by, "do not let him go!" Then turning again to Fred, she continued, almost shrieking, for the wind every bar words, "Oh, Fred, stay, stay; for my sake, stay!"

But fatterness was in the heart of Fred Wilson, and with a cold gesture he loosened her hands from his arm, and turning to me, made a sign that I should remove her. I half led, half carried her away, and, turning my head, saw Fred Wilson climb into the boat, shouting, "Now, my lads, who dares?"

Amy was sobbing and wringing her hands, and begged pathetically that I would go back and stop him, relating to me how fearful he was.

Two or three of the neighbors relieved me of my half-fainting burden, and I turned back toward the life-boat.

To be awakened at any time from a sound sleep to some scene of excitement always produces an indescribable feeling of there being a want of reality in what passes, but never did I feel this more strongly than on that fearful night. The flickering light of the waves and the howling of the mighty wind had a bewildering effect with which it was hard to combat, and it is as if in some such dream I looked from which I was anxious to awake and be freed. The boat was only three parts manned, for the men, brave though they were, dared not face the billows. Old weather-beaten fishermen shook their heads at it and looked on to another that "that there chap," for they'll never launch her," and I, knowing the peril of those on board, gnawed my lips at my own impotence and want of energy.

All this had occurred in a very few minutes, and even in that short space the gale seemed to have increased in fury. At times it was impossible to keep to stand against it, and with clothes drenched with spray, it seemed to numb and paralyze mind as well as body. I gazed like light from the lighthouse, and where she lay, and we heard, or fancied we heard, the shouts of those on board, for they were only five or six hundred yards distant. Every one present was in a state of the greatest excitement, and though fresh arrivals were constantly appearing, all shrank from a combat with the fearful sea-now running.

I appealed to a stout fellow by me and pointed to the boat, but he shook his head as a knot collected round, and his stated as the unanimous opinion of the group as he said, "It's no use, matter. It 'ud be us' ye gettin' shut of o' this life. She must go to pieces directly: an' as to Master Fred there, he couldn't find a gainer way to the church-yard than tryin to launch that boat."

I found I had only to look at a man after this for him to turn away and, sick at heart, I felt that the venture must be desperate when these men, born in the place, and upon this spot, dared not make the attempt.

On looking round I found old Wilson by my side, a fine old gray-haired farmer, with a coil of rope on his shoulder. On seeing me he spoke, and I could see the old man was all of a tremble as in a broken voice he said, "There's my boy trying to get out the boat, and I can't go and stop him. I can't stand here and know some of God's creatures are being choked with the sea-water and howl my lad back from going; but Lord knows, Sir, I shall be ready to throw on my knees if they can't launch her."

If I were asked, and gave a frank reply, I should say that I was decidedly not constitutionally a coward. As a boy at school I dreaded fighting, and it was only after repeated blows and ill-usage of various kinds that the pugilistic instinct was roused within me, in my breast which proved a terror to my enemies, and drove away Jack Brown, our bully who would fight, crying, with the bridge of his nose seriously damaged. And on this memorable night, surrounded by the excited crowd, and with Fred Wilson appealing, or rather invoking, me to help him within my breast, and a nervous trembling about my knees, all the symptoms of cowardice. Love of self, thoughts of home and friends whom I might see no more, the danger of the enterprise, the boiling surf, and the mighty billows rushing from other madly shoreward, all tended to increase the feeling; and then came a reaction; another gun made the ground tingle through my frame, and I felt that the old Adam rocket I fancied I could see forms clinging to the rigging of the dark, indistinct mass out on the sands.

I looked at Fred as he stood at the boat's head, with the blazing fire lighting up his noble manly form, and his features and the surrounding crowd before him, and then, with a muttered "God help me!" I was at his side, followed by a score of others. The cheers broke forth again, for my example was followed, and two stout young fellows climbed in before. The men were ordered to their places by Fred, and then in a whirl of excitement I was in my place, with a strong ash blade in my hand, ready with my companions to push off the boat when the cruel sea.

Rushing waters—choking spray—blinding surf—and the noise as of a thousand cataracts in one's ears, and we were launched amidst the boiling confusion of mad billows. Then came a struggle, and we were beaten back and the boat almost stove in by being dashed upon the beach. It was quickly run on the ridge of the bank, and as I sprang out a semi-shelter of a row of piles, we were again launched, and this time with better success, backing water to the direction of the vessel, which was now a dark hulking like a cork upon the mighty waves which seemed almost to curl over her in their rage. As we neared them the storm grew severely feeling, and I felt in a perfect frenzy, straining at my oar with nerves in a state of tension for the battle with the waters.

At last, after a tremendous struggle with winds and waves, we were under the lee of the ill-fated vessel, and then it was some time before we could communicate with her by a rope. Go close up we could not; for the waves were dashing her against her decks, and the passengers and crew, about thirty in number, had been driven aft and huddled on the sloped over toward us as the vessel lay upon her beam-ends. At length we got ten in our boat—one more fellow, and we should be safe. Fred held the end of the rope, and with pale, agonized face disappearing in the hissing waters. Another struggle with the breakers, and the freight was landed, the boat was hurriedly partaken of, and soon we were again under the vessel's lee, returning this time with every available person on board, all down from rope of communication. We landed them, and then, half exhausted, we rested on our oars, regardless of the crew, who were clinging fast to the mainmast.

The moon was just sullenly breaking, and seas were fearfully high, as we drew away from the vessel, which lifted with each wave, and then came down with a fearful crash. It was evident she must soon go to pieces, and a momentary desire to make one exertion in order to finish our task.

As we reached then the mast went by the board, and the drowning wretches were plunged into the boiling surf. We were backing water toward the vessel, and consequently could not see what was occurring, in obedience to our cockswain's warning cry we pulled forward to avoid the tangled mass of rigging close by us. We were successful, and as I rose and we reached them and took them off, one of them holding with a deadly grip a submerged body, which we took in as a corpse. Then the boat appeared, and we were about rowing shoreward when a hand rose from the waters and clutched my oar. It was never my fortune to witness in history a struggle and dagging energies, blinded and almost drowning, to save a fellow-creature's life.

I remember little more, except seeing, after a quarter of an hour's hard rowing, the heads of the little group of people standing on the beach, the cheers we heard, and then there was a crash and a heavy shock: the boat was capsized, and we were all struggling in the water. The cockswain shouted within me; I knew it was a struggle for life or death, and I escaped to swim; but I don't recollect striking any particular blow in the struggle. The struggle lasted I can not tell, but it was ended by my being dashed by the waves on the beach, and I recollected no more until I found myself lying on the sand, surrounded by a throng of anxious faces, and on my left side Fred Wilson, his face pale across, lay Fred Wilson, our gallant cockswain.

Sobbing, weeping, and ringing both her hands, holding his head in her lap, was Amy, and even in the half-confused state in which I felt I could not help something like a grim smile coming across my face at the sight before me, so perfect an exemplification was it of a woman's nature. Rough but willing hands were pressing "aqua" fit enough upon me, the effect of which was to make me try to rise, but only to sink back helpless; for I found I had a dislocated knee, and in company with the seemingly lifeless body of poor Fred, I was placed in a donkey-cart and taken to the Wilsons'.

The rest of our party, as I afterward learned, were safe, but any thing but sound; for bruised—in one instance maimed—and half drowned, they had been dragged ashore by those awaiting their return.

I staid at Wilson's house waiting for convalescence, and sharing with Fred in the ministrations of Little Amy. Poor Fred was nearly at death's door on one occasion, for the shock of his blow, the excitement, and the terrible cut he received, left him with a wild fever, from which he recovered but slowly.

But Amy—quiet, subdued, little tearful-eyed Amy—seems every day, and Fred seemed in no hurry to get well, as I doubled about with a crutch and a stick, and one afternoon, when just walking from my garden door, I heard well-known voices in the adjoining apartment. In my half-waking state I can not be sure of their import, but they sounded like "Fred, my darling," and again, darling?"

"Never, dear Fred, oh, never!"

And then followed something like a sob or a sigh, and a sound that put me in mind of lying with a child in a little white covered cot, with a fair, sweet face nestling on my arm, and a pair of soft lips parting from mine to whisper, "God bless you!"

A WRITER for one of the rebel journals gives the following account of gossip in regard to the handwriting of General Lee and General Longstreet:

"Some days since I was in the room of General Lee and General Grant in now before me, and I have been much struck with the handwriting of the former. The character of the style has brought forward on either side. General Lee's hand-writing is bold and rather stiff, the letters long and well-rounded, and very distinct. He leans heavily upon the pen, and his words are all written in a clear, bold hand. The words, as if writing were a labor to him. The following is a fac-simile of the letter in which he resigned his place as General Grant:

"'Richmond, Va., April 20, 1861.

"'Sir: I have held your letter of the 15th inst. accepting a copies of letters from Judge Gold Camp' of Fi-Fifteen Regiments of Infantry, Two Cavalry and Ho-Hoh's E. M. States Sec'y of War and Lt. Col. Mulford of the County of Ca-Cavalry, Virginia.

"General Grant's handwriting, on the contrary, though not so bold and different, the letters as long and well-rounded and even, is nevertheless very legible and very striking. It is full of energy and action, and he crosses all his t's to the right, and follow one after another with a little space between them, which has impressed me as a peculiarity of his brigades on a rapid march around Lee's right. Longstreet's handwriting is very fine and small, and a running hand. The words occupy much space from left to right, and are very small and legible. His t's are crossed with attention to punctuation, abbreviations less, and is equally legible. He never leans upon the pen in his rapid composition, yet in reading his letter I can not but picture the fact that he is a thoughtful, reserved man, full of fire and action, always in motion, and always in a hurry.

"Stonewall Jackson's hand-writing is such as what would be denominated as experienced and characteristic. Neither bold nor rather stiff, but neither of these. As we selected to take charge of a country school, if their selection should be agreeable to the wishes of the Gov. We have two more witnesses, in two no who occupy more of the world's attention than any other two men. I mean to say that 'great men write poor hands.'"

CHAPTER LX.

SIR WILLIAM LOSO had called many times upon Lily at her new home, hovering about her with a throbbing heart, and a declaration of love faltering upon his tongue. That pure and tender love had rolled back twenty years of his life. He had fasted his full upon all the vain pleasures of the world, and had become sated of them; but now, with the image of Lily's sweet innocent face ever before him, his zest for life was renewed; he felt that there was yet something better worth living for than all the empty pleasures in which he had wasted his youth.

The old Indian had received him kindly, and shown him much favor. He was flattered by the baronet's attentions, and liked his company. From that quarter he had every encouragement. Lily, too, was always glad to see him, and often expressed her gratitude for all his kindness. But it was only gratitude. Sir William saw that she was still thinking of Edgar, adoring the idol had revealed its worthless clay, and the scales had fallen from her too trusting eyes.

Constant, who was aware of Sir William's passion, and favored it, wrote to the baronet and informed him of the discovery of Edgar. Sir William immediately called at the hotel and learned all particulars. The letter did not surprise him, but he was infinitely relieved to find that Lily's eyes were at last opened, and that she had escaped the danger which he so much dreaded. So pure and disinterested was his love for the girl, that for the moment he had no thought of himself. And so scrupulous was his sense of honor, that he drew a check for two hundred pounds, and insisted upon Constant sending it to the scape-grace in fulfillment of the promise which he had given him; "not actually made, by the overtures of Frans Stumm."

"The scamp does not deserve it," said Constant.

"Perhaps not," said the baronet; "but that is no reason why I should be less than generous. Get the check cashed at the bank, and give him the money in your own name."

The money was duly conveyed to Edgar, and the first thing he did on getting out of the opening-house was to array himself in a dandified suit of clothes, and call at Sweeney's, that Constant met him in the hall. The sultan was as high and mighty, as haughty and supercilious ever. He threw upon his suit and swaggered into the hotel with the confident air of an invading Czesar. His manner cowed Edgar at any words, "I have come, and when I have seen I shall conquer."

"You may consult upon me, my good fellow," he said to Constant, with a patronizing air. "Your trouble shall be well rewarded; but between you and me and the post," he added, tapping Constant on the shoulder with his cane, "I begin to suspect that the little party soon you, eh?"

Constant could scarcely keep his temper.

"You have come on the wrong errand," he said. "I will send up your card. No doubt Miss Blunt will be glad to see you."

Greyfaunt stared at the name.

"Blunt!" he said; "is that her name?"

"I should have thought," said Constant, "you would be acquainted with the name of a lady who is so devoted to you."

"Well," said Greyfaunt, "her mother called herself Madame Ernestine; but then these circus women take all sorts of absurd names. I only knew her as Lily. Surely her father was not that dirty, drunken Griffin Blunt, who put an end to his miserable existence in the Seine?"

"Miss Blunt's father was a gentleman, Sir," said Constant, glaring at him angrily. "But here is Miss Blunt's answer."

The servant who had taken up Greyfaunt's card here returned and presented him with a letter.

"I am instructed," he said, "to return this to you, and to say that Miss Blunt has gone out."

Greyfaunt was completely taken aback. He saw at a glance that it was his own letter, the letter he had addressed to Constant. He opened it hurriedly to make sure, and his eye fell upon his own words, "If you serve me in this you shall have no reason to complain of your share of the plunder."

"Why, what does this mean?" Edgar stammered out.

"It means, Sir," said Constant, "that the lady is now aware of your true character, and has nothing to say to you."

"And you did this?" said Greyfaunt, with an assumption of indignation.

"Yes, I did it," Constant replied, deliberately, "and from the bottom of my soul I rejoice to think that I have saved this innocent young lady from the toils of a worthless wretch."

"Insolent scoundrel!" he cried, "how dare you insult a gentleman?" And in the heat and passion of the moment he struck at Constant with his cane.

The hotel-keeper avoided the blow, and with great coolness walked up to the dandy, wrenched his cane from him, and broke it across his knee.

"Turn that man out of the hotel!" Constant said, in a tone of command to his servants.

Two stalwart fellows in livery immediately stepped forward, and, seizing Greyfaunt by the collar, hurried him down the steps, and thrust him into the street, Constant throwing his broken cane after him.

It is possible that the great-fallen sultan, as he slunk out of Great Grand Street that day, recalled a similar scene in which he had used some share. Poor Griffin Blunt was avenged.

Lily's first feeling, when she perused the damnatory letter addressed to Constant, was one of bitter grief. But when she began to reflect, and to examine her own feeling, became one of shame. She had deceived herself, and in her blind selfishness had been ungrateful to one who loved her tenderly and truly. When she went back to the retrospect of that Green, with dismay, and remembered how she carried away with her the image of the tall, handsome gentleman who was so good and kind, who took to his home the poor little lost girl, who caressed her so tenderly and gently at parting—when she remembered that it was this image which she carried away with her to Paris, that it was this image that she clung to and loved, and that Edgar was merely a new appearance of that beauty which she had indued with all the generous qualities of the tall, handsome form that was filling from her memory—she hid her face in her hands and sobbed for very shame. The god of her idolatry was Sir William Long; and all that was noble she had heaped a mere jest, which her fancy had invested with its attributes.

Sir William sought no interview with Lily until after the day of her disenchantment had passed away. He called every day, however, to make kind inquiries, and always left a message that Constant never failed to send up to Lily's room.

At first Lily was relieved to find that he did not ask to see her. She was afraid that he would despise her. She at least felt that she was not worthy of his love any more. She reproached herself bitterly, and often sat for hours in her own room rocking herself to and fro, with her hands clasped over her face, and sighing and crying pitifully.

"How can I ever look in that good, generous face again, and tell it how false I am?"

But as days passed on, and Sir William still continued to call, and to send kind messages, trying to see her, Lily began to feel uneasy. Did he despise her? and were these merely calls of formal courtesy? Or, if he loved her, could she found herself anxiously asking why he did not come. Every afternoon, about the time she was accustomed to see him, she would find herself standing behind the curtains in her uncle's grand sitting-room, peeping out into the street to watch for his carriage. Many broughams and carriages drove up to the door of the house in Great Grand Street opposite, and Lily had no means of recognizing Sir William's carriage unless she saw Sir William himself. One day a brougham stopped, a footman approached the door, and stood talking for a few minutes with its unseen occupant. At the close of the colloquy the footman walked to the corner of the hotel-keeper by a long thin, white hand. It was his hand! Lily did not even forget it! It was the hand which had fondled and patted her at Greenwich—the hand upon which she had noticed the great diamond ring—the hand with the big ruby, whose motto was "Hope and Fortune."

Fortune had come, and she valued it not a straw. The grandeur by which she was surrounded chilled and terrified her; the jewels which her uncle had given her, and the gold chains binding her to a blank and soulless life. The hope at her breast, the hope of love and accord, had not yet been fulfilled.

"Oh, why does he not come? why does he not come?"

The very next day the brougham drove up to the door, and from her love's watch-tower behind the window-curtain Lily saw Sir William get out and enter the hotel. Almost the next instant the servant announced him.

Lily's heart was fluttering in her breast like a scared bird in a cage. The room swam before her eyes, and she was about to fall, when the handsome form of the visitor appeared, and pinioned between two others. She heard her name mentioned, and lifting up her eyes from the ground saw Sir William standing before her, the calm, earnest, loving face which had first won her heart, and which she knew that she had so long sustained and cheered her in the time of her misery and solitude.

"Tell me, my child," said William, almost doubtfully, "am I welcome? Are you glad to see me?"

Lily could not reply. Her eyes fell, her head dropped upon her bosom, and she sank upon a couch.

Sir William sat down beside her and begged for an answer.

"Lily, Lily," he said, "I have loved you with the same love ever since you were a little child at Greenwich. Have you forgotten it?"

Poor Lily! It only pained her the more that he should think she had forgotten that bright day. She felt in her conscience that she had given him cause to think so.

"Forgotten it?" she said. "Oh no, no, no!"

"Do you remember it well?" said the baronet.

"As if it were yesterday," Lily replied.

"Do you remember," he continued, "do you remember asking me if I were good? I was not good then, but I became a better man from that day. You asked me if I ever went to church. I confessed to you that I never went to church. But I went to church on the following Sunday, and on many Sundays after. Do you remember the apple, and throwing the peel over my left shoulder, when it fell upon the carpet in the shape of the letter W? You clapped your hands and said, 'How nice!' and asked me to be your sweet-heart. But you were a child then. You don't remember it as I do."

Quite unconsciously Sir William was cutting poor Lily to the very quick. She remembered all these things, and had thought of them often and often, clinging to them with a longing, loving heart, until the day that Edgar appeared. Then she began to forget. But he had cherished them from day to day.

"Oh, Sir William," she cried, "you make me feel that I have been very ungrateful, very foolish, very wicked."

"Lily!" he exclaimed; "what have I said to pain you?"

"Nothing," she said. "It is not you who have given me pain; I have made the scourge for myself. I know the deep debt of gratitude I owe you—"

"Still that cold word, Lily," he said, pitifully.

She hung her head and sobbed.

"Sir William," she continued through her tears, "I ought to throw myself at your feet and beg your forgiveness on my knees; you, who have been so good, so kind, so trusting; while I—but I can not speak what is at my heart. Leave me now; I am not worthy of you; let me write to you and explain all, and then if you can forgive me—"

Her tears choked her utterance. She rose from the couch, left the room, and rushed from the room, sobbing bitterly.

Sir William Loso left the hotel with a sad heart, sorely troubled and perplexed. He could only guess at the cause of Lily's distress. He distrusted his own judgment, found himself forswearing—for having loved the worthless Edgar, perhaps. Or possibly she might have discovered, as Sir William was her mother's well-known benefactor at Ranelagh, and was pained that she could not requite that kindness with love. Or it was the thought of his age. He was forty. He had spent the best of his days. And Lily? Lily was just budding into womanhood. As yet, maybe her the world lay all fresh and new, with joys and pleasures yet to be tasted. Why should he mar her bright young life with his? And yet the disparity was not so great after all. Marriages between forty and twenty-five-and-twenty-two, and, when made for love, there was no reason why they should not be as happy as any other—nay, happier, for the love was not of forty in no feeble fancy no boy's caprice. As for Sir William, he knew that he could love Lily with an abounding affection. He had watched over her and done upon her to the last; ay, that he could worship her as a holy being, and bow to her as to a guardian angel.

His waited anxiously for the letter. It came on the next day, and was as follows:

"MY DEAR, GOOD, KIND FRIEND,—I scarcely know what to say to you now that I have sat down to write the letter which I promised. My heart throbs, and my head aches, and my hand trembles as if I were about to commit a crime. But I am not ashamed. I have spoken to you; I have revealed to me, now that I have awakened from that delusive dream.

"What I wish to say is, that I have never ceased to love you from that day at Greenwich, which I so well remember. You, my friend, my father. I know it now; but how how can I tell you? I carried your image away with me to Paris, and there it was taken by my mother. I carried away with me not only a vision of your face, but a memory of your kindness, the pressure of your gentle hand upon my hair, the soft touch of your lips upon my brow. I was a solitary girl at school. I had no friends to correspond with, and so I never wrote home to tell those days like the other girls. When I closed my eyes now the vision seemed faint and indistinct. I could not see you. I was forgetting your form and features. And yet my heart was clinging to the best memory of my life. He was handsome, and possessed many of the qualities which I had so long sustained and cheered her in the time of her misery and solitude.

was it in his manner that did not please her? She did not think him humble enough. The subtle demon of pride, that sat ever like a familiar spirit at her elbow, whispered her that he took too much for granted. So she refused him; when all the while he was to her the crown and glory of manhood—when she was hungry for his love, and would rather have had the right to weep over his grave than to share with any other man a kingdom.

He took her refusal quietly enough. It was not like him to make ado. They were silent a little while after that, and then she said—

"So you go away to-morrow?"

"Yes," he replied, somewhat sadly—"my furlough is over, and some other things are over for me too. I should hardly care to stay longer, Miss Mayne, even if I could."

She longed passionately just then to tell him that he was yielding his hopes too soon. If he had been less ready to raise the siege on the first note of defiance the fortress might yet have surrendered. But she kept her secret obstinately. Colonel Eustace was above any petty resentment—above even the bitterness of wounded pride. He was not less kind than usual. His little soldier, as they both called her, lingered long through the woods. He gathered a few fire-tinted leaves as they went along, and gave them to her—his last offering.

She wore them that night. She made a garland of them for her dark hair, and fastened a bunch of them on her breast. She had seldom looked so beautiful. An unspoken longing flushed her cheeks to flame. Her eyes were brilliant with the light of brightness, her lips scarlet. She wore a thin, gossamer-like black dress, shot with golden stars. Heaps of invitations were in her room on her dressing-table. On brow and bosom burned the vivid autumn leaves. Colonel Eustace could not soon forget the radiant vision. He danced with her that night. It was the first time. When he first came his watchful eye had prevented; and later they had so much to talk about that they had let the music sound, and the "dances dance in tune, unheeded. But to-night there was something in the wild waltz music that seemed akin to both their moods. They whirled around in swift circles, but never looking at each other, her breath coming and going against his cheek. She wished the music would never stop. She felt a heart-sick longing to rest on that hour eternal. If she could dance on forever, supported by his arm, with his eyes meeting and answering her own, she would have been content, she thought, with such an immortality. But pitilessly soon the waltz was over. They began to form sets for something else; but she and Eustace her left the dancers with one accord. After that one bewildering waltz any thing else would be tame.

They passed into another room, and he asked her to sing. She went to the piano willingly enough. She knew he would have refused him nothing this last night. She ran her fingers over the keys, and they broke at her touch into a burst of—what? It was in the music the long-ing cry of a soul. It swelled out on the salt seawind which came in at the windows—a plaint of hate, of misery, of despair. Then she sang:

"Oh let the solid ground
Not fail beneath my feet
Before my life is found
Which some have found as sweet!
Then let come what come may:
What matter if I go mad?
I shall have had my day.

"Let the sweet heavens endure,
Not close and darken above me,
Before I am quite sure
That there is one to love me;
Then let come what come may,
To a life that has been so sad:
I shall have had my day."

When she rose her eyes met his. Her voice had had not one half the wild power that was in them. She told as plainly as eyes could the story of her repentance—her longing for the past of great price she had thrust away from her out of her listless hand. He had reverenced her less he would have ceased to love her. He fancied he so far above all trifling, or vanity, or fickleness, that he supposed her yes must be yes, and her nay, nay; and so made no attempt to change it. In the dark, appalling eyes, in the pathetic paint of the rich voice, he read, indeed, the longing for love: but he thought it was for another love, not his; and so he took her proud sight, and good-by, without saying any thing of his disappointment, or giving her any opportunity to take back her refusal. She stood a moment, trying to conquer her pride. She longed to whisper,

"I forgive you all what I did and said to-day;" but smoked she could not. If he had spoken only one word—but how could she speak first? So she shut the gate of her Paradise with her own hand.

"Good-by," he said; "I shall be off before you are up to-morrow; so I must thank you to-night for some happy hours."

"Good-by, Colonel Eustace;" pride made her voice steady. "I shall think of you, and summer, and Thornycroft—three pleasant remembrances, I suppose?"

Her words were light enough; but she turned away suddenly to hide some traitor tears—looking back, though, to smile and wave her hand as she went up the stairs.

In her own room she looked at her life just as it was, putting aside all disguises, and leaving for pride itself no refuge ground. The first thing was pale. She loved Giles Eustace with all her heart. She had never loved before; and she knew it was not in her ever to love again. So the blow she had given him had been the death-blow of her own happiness. She tried to look on into the weary, coming years—years lighted by no such dreams as most girls cherish of some fairy prince yet to come, some story yet to be told which shall set life to music. Her prince had come, and been sent away unacknowledged. What fabric was left of which to make her dreams? She had been happy enough without love until this summer; why should not the coming years be like the past, and yet more abundant? Why did the old routine look so inexpressibly dull and wearisome? She not the long night through, pitying herself for her loss.

In the early morning she heard below a bustle of preparation. She knew Colonel Eustace was about to leave. A wild impulse seized her to go down, even then, and tell him all. She rose and looked at herself in the toilet-glass. By the sickly rays of the lamp, which had burned all night, her face was wan and ghastly. What if she should not be able to see him alone? Could she go down in her evening dress, with the faded flowers and lusterless eyes which told the story of her vigil, and meet half a dozen other pairs of eyes? But perhaps there would be time even yet for a fresh toilet. Dressed suitably for morning she could go down and mingle with the rest. If she had an opportunity to see him alone she could use it. She took off her dress and brushed her hair out hurriedly. Stopping, though, to tear carefully aside every one of the vivid-tinted leaves she had worn the night before—his last gift. And as she was fastening her dress with hasty, trembling fingers, she heard him say good-by, and looking out she saw him ride away. The last opportunity was gone. She said to herself that fate was against her; but it is my private opinion that if she had finished dressing in time she would not have gone down—her enemy was pride, not fate.

A little later they went back to New York, she and her mother and the old nurse once again. Never had Miss Laura been so enchanting. You are surprised? You thought, perhaps, that she had found that herself up in fields of fashion and frivolity—or, perhaps, you picture her as a nurse in a soldier's hospital? Not at all—nothing so close to good. Then you reckoned without due knowledge of human nature, or forgot to take into account the fact that it is a law of life that a society that trouble matures a woman into a saint. You shall not find in every girl to whom fate has given a heart-break the making of a Florence Nightingale. The majority resort for distraction in their troubles to precisely the same things they have been doing all their lives, and bring devotion with herself—only made her more dangerous. She had no lack of lovers, and she had her choice from the full height of her indifference, and ceased to think it too much trouble to please. She was afraid, perhaps, that the world would guess at her secret; and the ceaseless pressure of her pain goaded her to a kind of reckless, desperate gayety that was profoundly fascinating to all who came within its influence.

At last one of her admirers seemed to distance the rest. She was more attentive to Frank Lorilard's nothings, more complaisant of his humors, than she had ever been known to be before. He was a self-complacent fool, and he thought her conquered—knowing well the code of society, and walking by it without turning to left or right. You never would have thought her heart-broken to look at her. There was something in his cool self-possession that had almost the effect of greatness. But he was not great—he was brilliant. His talents were those of fully-cultivated whisker were unexceptionable. So were his coat and his waistcoat—and his boots. So was he—in one manner. So was his conversation. He talked platitudes with an air of sense and originality which imposed upon Laura Mayne. Truth me, it did not impose upon Laura Mayne. Yet she deliberately made up her mind to marry him and the half million of money that he had inherited.

Of course she must marry some time—it was expected of her. It made little difference to her whom. When she has set neither ambition nor love before her, she is apt to be indifferent. Lorilard no candle can make it noonday. So she smiled benignantly on his wishes, and let him dangle, and sang for him, or danced with him, whenever he asked her. Only there were some songs she never sang, and there were waltz tunes she never, or even Mr. Lorilard could persuade her to dance. It was keen torture when she heard it. It carried her back to Thornycroft. She felt the sea-wind creeping in at the windows, and heard a voice that only her ears could hear—she looked into eyes full of fateful light, and thrilled in every nerve to the spell.

But when Mr. Lorilard proposed she accepted him. It was not necessary that he should be eloquent in all things to speak hastily. She had read that day the order that the Army of the Potomac should advance. She knew that the Fifth Corps must go with them, to danger, and likely enough to death. She should never see him more, she thought. If she had had him like that she loved him! If he had but once kissed her, but once held her close to that true heart of his! But he was not her lover. What could it matter what cold prayers for pardon when death has sealed the lips? She accepted it with courtly grace. Then was not much fire or fervor in his nature. All that there was Laura Mayne had given. But he really loved her as well as he could love any thing in the universe, except himself. He gloried in her beauty—her grace, her accomplishments. Then he thought, had any Lorilard carried home a more fitting bride.

His calmness did not last after he went away. She hated herself for the bargain she had made. She struck the hand he had kissed with a frantic passion of scorn. She walked to and fro in her room with eager, hurrying steps, like one seeking escape and finding none. Then she said to herself, with a bitter sneer,

"Take it easy, Mrs. Lorilard that is to be. You have not sold yourself for nothing. Do not speak the beauty your lord so prizes by any unseemly frenzies."

If Colonel Eustace had wanted any revenge he must have been satisfied had he seen her that night. With the dawn of the next day her composure came back to her. She knew what she had done, and she meant to look the consequences in the face. She thought the future life could be not much worse than her life the past winter had been. The very intensity of her first emotions had produced by the law of reaction a passive, torpid, quiescent state, which she mistook for resignation. Mr. Lorilard was charmed with her sweetness, and urged an early marriage. She was ready enough to comply. One done, she thought, she should be able to let her mind rest on the prospect that stung her so ceaselessly now. She should be done with longings and regrets after her marriage vows had put an inevitable gulf between—written its epitaph.

In the very midst of her preparations came the fighting in the Wilderness and at Spottsylvania. With a terrible, tearing fear at her heart she searched the list of the wounded, and found his name—"Wounded dangerously, Colonel Giles Eustace. Until she read that sentence she had not quite known how dear he was—how her life was bound up with his. She was powerless, then, to lay the ghosts which haunted her. Her own soul spoke to her a mercy which would not be silenced. Dead or alive, she knew she belonged to that man. What did her betrothal vows mean? What had she been going to do? With a calmness that surprised herself she communicated the news to her mother. She had the newspaper in her hand, and pointed mutely to that paragraph.

"Our friend of last summer?" Mrs. Mayne asked.

"Mother," she said, not heeding the question, "I must go to him at my own soul. I should be sinning against God and myself to marry any one else—sinning against him also, for he loved me. Mother, you must tell Mr. Lorilard that I can not marry him."

There were few things that Mrs. Mayne would not have done for her daughter without remonstrance. She had no intention of refusing to do this one service. She had no objections to make. There was a pitiful helplessness in her voice as she gasped,

"What shall I say? Laura, how can I?"

Laura looked at her a moment as she sat there, white of lip and trembling of limb; and in the midst of her own pain she made excuse for her at the dismay pictured so strongly on her mother's face.

"You need not do it," she said, soothingly; "you shall not. It was my place for me to ask you. I can do it myself much better than you. Be tranquil."

But she had spoken rashly. They both knew what it was—the only one who came so early. Mrs. Mayne made her escape hurriedly, and Laura summoned her courage for the battle. It was not easy to interrupt Mr. Lorilard's tender speeches. He was quite too self-confident to observe that they were misplaced. He sat silent, trying to think what to say, until he mentioned their wedding-day. Then he wrote come, passionately, eagerly, in spite of himself. Laura was more direct than she had meant they should be.

"I can never marry you—never. I love another man with all my heart and soul. I should be sinning alike against you and Heaven to become your wife."

Here was a case in which Mr. Lorilard's code of rules failed him. He had never contemplated such a possibility, and had to find his way out of it as best he could, without help from precedent or conventionalities. He answered with an emphasis which others than Laura Mayne should start at anger.

"It seems to me, Miss Mayne, you have taken a singular time to make this discovery."

"I knew it from the first," she cried, "only I thought I could forget it. But I can not. I can not. Forgive me. I never meant to wrong you. I thought I could love you as well as you expected me to. But I did not realize how impossible a task I was attempting."

He took refuge in coldness.

"I am grateful for your efforts in my behalf," he said, sullenly; "but I could wish you had understood your own mind a little sooner. You have made a rich ridiculous. Of course, after your very emphatic expression of your sentiments, I can have no more, and shall make no attempt to change your decision."

He rose to go. She sprang forward and clasped her hands on his arm.

"But you will forgive me?" she cried. "You will not go until you have said that?"

His cold, handsome face contrasted the pleading eyes, the earnest, lovely face. But he turned away, evidently

"I at least, am no hypocrite," he said. "My feelings toward you must matter little; you have shown supreme indifference to them."

With those words he coldly withdrew his arm from her clasp and went away. Fifty him a little. If his love, now that he was no deep or so intense as some men's, he had given her the best he had to give, and she had wounded him in the tenderest point.

To her the shock, when she read that newspaper paragraph, had been like the finding of her soul to Indian. All her possibilities became actual from that time. Pride, selfishness, indolence retreated like baffled foes, routed in the conflict. For the first moment she was her best self. She would have gone to Colonel Eustace, but she felt that she had no claim. She could not write to him lest he should be too ill to read her words. So she contented herself by trying to be what he had fancied her. She took up all her tape of sewing-bags again, even in this world. Hope was a component part of her splendid, resilient temperament. If she had seen him lying dead before her she would have hoped still; only she would have lifted her waiting eyes to the world of spirits, and her faith would have been strong enough to anchor itself there. While he yet lived she believed that they must some time meet; and she tried to grow worthier of him. She was not sad. Her mother, knowing her secret, wondered constantly at her cheerfulness.

One day, in June, his sister, Mrs. Meredith, came to see her. They had been somewhat intimate at Thorne croft, but had not met often during the winter. Mrs. Meredith had been ignorant of her brother's proposal and its rejection, and had believed him and Laura Mayne the best of friends merely. She had heard of Laura's engagement to Frank Lorilard; and, like the rest, thought, need make no difference about her errand.

"My brother will be home to-night," she said, as soon as she was seated.

The drawing-room was fashionably dark, so she could not see the swift flash that stained her listener's cheek.

"Colonel Eustace?" Laura asked, with instant regaining of her self-command. "I thought he was seriously wounded."

"Yes, he was wounded, but not so severely as was at first reported. He is almost well again already. He will be here to-night, and next week he will go with us for a few days to Thorncroft, and then back to the seat of war. I wanted to have a few of his old friends there to welcome him tonight. I don't think he will be fit for much enjoyment, for he will only travel from Philadelphia to-day. Will you come? You may bring Mr. Lorilard with you if you like."

"Mr. Lorilard is no longer at my service," Laura said, with a smile.

Mrs. Meredith was too well-bred to ask questions.

"Come alone, then," she said, graciously; "but don't fail to come. Giles knew you so well last summer I am sure he will be glad to see you."

When her visitor was gone Laura went into her room, and took down from a peg in her wardrobe the dress she had worn that last night at Thornycroft. She had never worn it since. She would wear it to-night. She took out of a casket the fire-tinted autumn leaves. They were bright as ever, and fresh as the day they had evening in Meredith's drawing-room she looked just as she had done that other night. It wanted only the salt, suggestive sea-wind blowing through long, low windows, the square, old-fashioned room, to make complete the resurrection. Colonel Eustace thought so as he looked at her, and felt a chord in his heart that he had long believed silenced begin anew to vibrate. Her eyes and her cheeks were bright with a feverish expectation between hope and fear—she was radiant as his memories of her.

He was changed, as she had dreaded. He was a little lame, but there was no trace of the peril through which he had passed on the bronzed, handsome face.

Later in the evening, when he had been as polite as any one—more needful, he stole a little time for pleasure. He asked Laura to sing. She sat down again, and sang the old song with its old, passionate cry of love. And when it was over, her eloquent eyes met his, and this time a ray of enlightenment shot from them into his mind. He walked with her to a recess where roses were quite alone, and touched, as he stood beside her, the vivid autumn leaves.

"Leaves do not turn in June," he said—"these must be last year's trophies?"

"No, dear love."

The low voice quivered with emotion. The dark eyes sparkled beneath his gaze. He bent nearer to her, and whispered,

"Did you love me, Laura, after all?"

Then came her confession—a confession which, in its humility, would have reclaimed graver faults than hers. She told him not only the foolish pride which had made her refuse him at first, because she thought he was not humble enough; she told him just what her life since had been. She omitted no detail of her engagement with Frank Lorilard. She did not spare herself a single pang of humiliation. When she had told all, she said, simply, as her reward,

"I am afraid you will love your faith in me when you see I am so much worse than you thought me."

No matter for his answer. Lovers' raptures seemed to need a letter at first hand—some lie that makes them eloquent when they lose the indorsement of look, and tone, and gesture.

The next morning he made his appearance early at Mrs. Mayne's. After a little talk with Laura, they summoned her mother to their councels. Colonel Eustace looked hard to be convinced at once. Next time he went away, he said, he wanted to leave Laura his wife. He wanted to be sure that she would come to him constantly, and come to him if he needed her. Mrs. Mayne was of too kindly and sympathetic a nature to object. She only raised a little dilemma—what about the wedding-dresses?

This Laura settled. She would not buy new dresses, she said, but would wear on that occasion the preparation. It was not a time, when sons and brothers and husbands were dying on battle-fields, for American women to buy and flaunt, and flutter in gorgeous plumage. She would wear a white muslin, and be married without ornaments, as a recognizing resolution which some girls would have considered as courageous as leading a forlorn hope. So it involved her sacrifice. The years of her vanity were past. She had taken hold of the true meanings of life.

The next day they were married, and then they went with the Merediths to Thornycroft for one happy week. They roamed again through all the old paths, and remembered the old days together in these new days so much dearer and sweeter.

Just a week went away—and then it was over. At length he went away. Laura has known the anxieties, the watching and waiting, of a soldier's wife. So far her husband is safe: but if he falls she will scarcely grudge, to the cause for which he fights, the costly sacrifice. It will be only to wait a little longer—to look forward to a heavenly home, and a heavenly meeting, instead of an earthly one. She thinks, as she walks alone through the old paths, and gathers the fire-tinted leaves of this year's autumn, that come what will of future sorrow she dare not murmur, for she has had the full sweetness of love and of life—she has had her day.

DEACON JOHN PHILLIPS.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL JOHN G. RAWLINGS, GENERAL GRANT'S CHIEF OF STAFF.

DEACON JOHN PHILLIPS.

DEACON JOHN PHILLIPS, whose portrait we give above, is a resident of Sturbridge, Massachusetts, where he voted at the last Presidential election, having reached the age of 104 years. He has voted for General WASHINGTON and at every subsequent Presidential election, except that of 1860, when he was prevented by illness. At the recent election he was escorted to the Town Hall in a carriage, over which floated the American flag. At the announcement of the arrival of the venerable patriot at the door of the Hall, the citizens of the town, in token of reverence and respect, arose and stood with uncovered heads, while a detail of soldiers bore the "Old Gentleman" to the desk in front. He expressed the satisfaction he felt at seeing so many of the soldiers who had periled their lives in defense of the country, and desired to take each one by the hand. A line was formed of all the returned soldiers present, and each one was introduced to the venerable patriarch, with a statement of the length of time each had served in the army. The Deacon had a son present, who was seventy-nine years old, and who addressed the citizens.

Two sets of ballots were presented to the venerable voter in full view of all present—one being a ballot for ABRAHAM LINCOLN, the other for GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN—and the old gentleman was asked to take his choice. He reached out his hand and said, "I will vote for ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

The following preamble and resolution were unanimously adopted by the town:

"Whereas, our very venerable and highly respected fellow-citizen, Deacon JOHN PHILLIPS, who is this day one hundred and four years four months and nine days old, and who still retains his mental and physical faculties in a high degree; and, whereas, he has traveled some two miles to attend this town meeting, and has deposited his ballot for presidential electors and State officers, therefore,

"Resolved, That this be entered upon the records of the town, as a lasting memorial of his undying patriotism and devotion to country, and as an incident perhaps unparalleled in the annals of our Government."

GENERAL JOHN G. RAWLINGS.

GENERAL RAWLINGS, Chief of Staff to Lieutenant-General GRANT, and whose portrait we give on this page, was at the breaking out of the war engaged in the profession of law at Galena, Illinois. He was a townsman of General GRANT, and upon the appointment of the latter as field-officer, RAWLINGS, then a young man, was selected by him as a member of his staff. Since then, except at brief intervals of illness, he has retained this official connection with General GRANT. Upon one occasion he was wounded in the performance of his military duties. One feature is characteristic of him, and that is his modesty. One of the first hotels in this city was not long since honored with his presence for several days, but the proprietor did not until the last moment discover that he had been entertaining the chief of General GRANT'S staff. This is a peculiar feature distinguishing the Lieutenant-General himself from other men, and those whom he gathers about him have very much the same character. General RAWLINGS in a peculiar manner enjoys the confidence of General GRANT.

The New York Tribune, in speaking of Mason & Hamlin's Cabinet Organs, says: "These instruments have been blown by the wind of genuine success from Boston to San Francisco. That Messrs. Mason & Hamlin have succeeded in making a superior small instrument, from little bandbox-like things to those which, though portable, and not larger than a piano, can make themselves felt in a church, is the universal opinion of the musical profession. They agree that no such mechanical works of the kind can be found in equal perfection in Europe. The tone is pure and full, and with a harmonium body for so small a provocative mechanical force. They stand rough traveling, bad usage, and will live in climates which will kill American melodeons."

In our advertisement last week of the New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company there was an error in some of the copies. All communications should be addressed to the Company, New York Office, P. O. Box 6368, instead of Box 868, as printed.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical
PINEAPPLE CIDER,
Is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS.—The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him and others that the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicinal Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is the newly new to the public. One quart bottle will last a whole person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. It is not better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctor's bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness we so believe: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing you exercise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the flow of digestive juices, and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant has also made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that in gained ten pounds of flesh in one month, at the first trial. Directions for use are strictly directed, and Dr. Talbot (Physician) says it is a specific in entire prevention to sickness in his class. Also, other well-known gentlemen in New York have used the Medicine with satisfaction for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.
Price $2 per bottle (full quart); pints, $1; ½ pints, $1.
Quarts sent free by express on receipt of price. Freight paid and pints to be paid by the purchaser. All orders should be addressed to B. T. BABBITT, Sole Agent, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

"The most original and powerful Novel of the season."
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.
Publish this Day:
MARGARET DENZIL'S HISTORY.
ANNOTATED BY HER HUSBAND.
A NOVEL.
8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

"MARGARET DENZIL'S HISTORY" is the most original and powerful novel of the season. It contains plot and incident enough for half a score of 'sensation tales,' yet so skillfully are they managed that until the close the reader fails to perceive how massively the skill was. It is a drama in which every event and episode is arranged from the first scene: the slightest circumstance, apparently incidental or accidental, has a bearing upon all that follows. The characters, though mainly each of the common range of life, are attractively new. The style throughout is perfect consistency with their natures. There are at least four characters which will be remembered for years.

The New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company has been organized under the laws of the State of New York, for the purpose of mining for petroleum, and other minerals, and dealing in the same. It has located its principal business office in New York City, has its transit and shipping depot for petroleum in the world, and has taken measures to establish a connection with Liverpool, the most extensive petroleum market in the world, all under the direction of the Company. The managers and stockholders of the Company include among their number gentlemen largely interested in the petroleum business and who have gained both wealth and experience in the trade, by which justify the confident expectation of speedy, intelligent, and profitable management. It is believed that by a judicious investment of the funds of the Company dividends of from two to five per cent. a month on the capital stock can be realized.

The property to be conveyed to the Company consists of the lands and property enumerated in the following list. The interest can be greatly increased if desirable, and their present development completed, as funds shall come in from subscriptions.

List of Lands and Property.

FIRST.—One-tenth of the working interest in Lot No. 1, on the upper McElhenny Farm, containing ten acres. There are three wells on this lot, two of which are now producing about fifty barrels a day each, the third about ten barrels. A new well is also now in process of drilling, and will soon be completed. On this property are three good engines, tankage for over eleven hundred barrels, tubing, tools, office, &c.

THIRD.—One-tenth of the working interest in Lot No. 3, on the lower McElhenny Farm, containing one acre, and known as the Hatch lease, being the lease next below and adjoining the well-known Empire Well, which is now producing one hundred barrels a day. On this lot is one well producing about ten barrels, and another well which has been flowing eighty barrels a day, and which is expected to yield again, as soon as a "Horner," or air-gauge, can be put in, which is now being prepared, and a third well is now in process of being located. A fourth is down about four hundred feet, and is confidently expected to be a good well. There are three good engines, tankage, tubing, and an office on this lease.

THIRD.—One-fourth of the working interest of two lots adjoining, on the late Widow McClintock's Farm, containing half an acre each. On this property there is one well, known as the Phœnix Well, now pumping twenty barrels a day; and another down two hundred feet, which is expected to yield a good supply of oil, being within a few feet of a well on the adjoining property, producing one hundred barrels. Engine, tankage, and a short distance from the celebrated "Hammond Well," yielding three hundred barrels a day. A third well will be sunk immediately on this lease. The property is subject to a royalty of one-eighth of the production.

FOURTH.—A lot of oil land, in fee simple, on the Caldwell Branch of Oil Creek, containing about one hundred acres, lying on the south half of that part of the farm on the east side of the Caldwell Creek, about two miles above Titusville. The Briggs Oil Company own the land on the opposite side of the creek, on which a well is now about to be put down. The surface show of oil on this land indicates that it is a valuable piece of property. The above named property of this Company will be immediately put under development.

FIFTH.—A lot of land in fee simple, containing about one hundred acres, situated on French Creek, about four miles from the Allegheny River. All the land in this vicinity is good, and excellent lubricating oil is produced from wells in the neighborhood.

SIXTH.—A lot, in fee simple, of oil land on Cherry Run, containing about seventy-five acres, situated about three miles above Titusville, and only one mile from the Allegheny River. On this land on Cherry Run has been purchased, and all the wells put down have been productive. One well is down five hundred feet, which is said to be a good well.

SEVENTH.—Two-thirds of the working interest in the "Wheeler Well," on the John McClintock Farm, containing one acre more or less. One well is now producing about seventy barrels a day, and steadily increasing, and there is ample room for two more wells on the lot. There is an engine, tankage, and all necessary tools on the property, which is subject to a royalty of one-eighth.

EIGHTH.—One-thirty-second of the interest in a lease of one acre on the Farrer Farm, near the Buttonwood Run, and adjoining the well known as Dubuque Well.

NINTH.—One-sixteenth of the interest in two acres of the Oil Creek Farm, adjoining the Mowbray Well; with a good engine, one thousand feet of tubing, &c., &c. On this land are two wells, both of which have flowed, and will, quite probably, on if worked.

TENTH.—One half of the interest in two acres of oil lands on Cherry Run. This locality is now producing a great extent of oil, and is considered, large interests are being purchased in the immediate vicinity.

ELEVENTH.—Fifty acres of land on Oil Creek, five miles above Titusville, having a frontage on the creek of one hundred rods.

TWELFTH.—The Ridgway Farm, so called, comprising eighty-five acres of land near Titusville, having a front on Oil Creek of one hundred and fifteen rods, and having already upon it one well, which promises to be one of the very best on Oil Creek.

THIRTEENTH.—Two hundred acres of land, three miles above Titusville, with a front of three hundred rods on Oil Creek, and known as the Keenan Farm. This land is unimproved, and by expensive considered good property.

[N.B.—The three tracts last mentioned are not only valuable as oil land, but also for their lumber, being heavily timbered, and containing water-power and mill-privileges. Parties desiring to purchase lumber can have it by entering the demand for their saved lumber at 50 per thousand feet at the mill.]

FOURTEENTH.—Half of the interest in a lease of one acre on the McClintock Farm, known as the Buttonwood Lease. This tract fronts for thirty rods on Oil Creek, and contains two wells. Of these No. 1 is now producing about fifty barrels a day, and No. 2 will produce about the same when a derrick and engine for the latter can be set up.

FIFTEENTH.—One-sixteenth of the interest in two acres on the McElhenny or Funk Farm, near to Titusville, adjoining the Empire Well. On this lease one well is already down, and producing six barrels of oil per day.

SIXTEENTH.—One hundred and sixty-eight acres of land on Oil Creek, in the oil region of West Virginia.

SEVENTEENTH.—One hundred and eighty-five acres on Cow Creek, West Virginia.

[N.B.—The two last-named parcels of land border the two creeks mentioned, and are immediately adjoining all territory of the best character, and which is now producing as much as any on Oil Creek.]

EIGHTEENTH.—Seventy-five acres in fee, near Franklin, Venango County, Pa., with a front of eighty rods on the river. There are now yielding twenty barrels a day, having upon it three wells already producing, and four ready for tubing, with the necessary engines and tankage.

NINETEENTH.—The Palmer Farm, so called, being one hundred and sixteen acres in fee, three miles from Titusville, extending one hundred rods along both sides of Oil Creek, and a good oil land in every respect.

TWENTIETH.—Seventy-one acres in fee, on Little Oil Creek and Thompson Creek, four miles from Titusville.

TWENTY-FIRST.—Sixty-six of the twenty-five of the working interest in the oil produced, on a lease situated on the west side of Oil Creek on the Lower McElhenny Farm, and known as the Hyde Lease. There are seven on this land, having tubing and socket-rods on the same, and paid for, and a good eight-horse-power engine ordered.

With this extensive estate already secured to the Company, and with its advantages of accessibility and management, the prospects in both rest are inferior to none now offered in the market. Indeed, notwithstanding the large amount of capital which has now organized, the Company claims it, in fact, just at its beginning, as a brief statement will show.

"Capital oil," as it sometimes called even now in drug circles, is used to be collected by the Seneca and other Indians from the surface of Oil Creek and springs in that region. The first company formed for the purpose of this business was small [illegible] and was formed at Titusville in 1857, and in August, 1858, at 71 feet, the drill fell into a cavity, and the well began to yield about twenty barrels a day. Other companies were soon formed, and the yield of oil being found to be abundant, the business assumed the importance of a regular capital and a still greater speculative interest were at once attracted to it.

The Oil Region is now located in Western Pennsylvania, Southern New York, Northeastern Ohio, Northwestern Kentucky, and Western Virginia, not to mention other new fields from time to time found. The business has now been in operation for the last six years and has every consistently been progressive, with the flags, success, and innocuous fortunes made. The commercial uses of Petroleum have increased quite as rapidly as the supply, and the demand for it may be imagined from the facts in familiar, that it is now used in every household in the land, and that the Petroleum Exports from this country for the year ending with this month will reach, in value, at least Twenty-five Million Dollars.

In making preparations to carry on the business extensively, Large as the number of companies already formed, not as striking as the vast extent of the part already proved of these unknown subterranean treasures of oil. In a few years more, perhaps, some working limit to the business will be reached. Now, however, the New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company stands substantially as one of the early enterprises, and offers inducements only exceeded by those very few companies whose stock is practically sold out to stockholders. Such will be the case with the future advantage of early subscribers, from this reasonable start in business, only a limited portion of the stock of the Company is offered at the present rates.

As one evidence of the opinions of experts about the quality of the property of the New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company, we copy the following paragraphs from a letter of Mr. Mowbray, an operative chemist of reputation, established at 11 Nassau street, and prominent in the oil business from its very beginning:

"W. T. PHELPS, Esq., Vice-President, &c.:

"DEAR SIR,—

"I have observed that, without fail, the best wells have been reached in what was formerly the old bed of Oil Creek. The Drake Well, the Sherman Well, the Noble Well, and the Story Farm Wells are instances of this. Your lands here are mainly the Old Creek bottom. It (the Creek is now diverted south of them, and in the summer the evolution of gas has been so effective to the grass mowers that they have left them during mid-day for another part of the field. The Union Company's Well, set down to the third sandstone, in the most formative, gives a first-rate show of oil.

"If there are not the indications of oil territory, then only until after a series of wells has been actually sunk on the land can any opinion be formed. What the value of the land will then be you can judge; but the price will be beyond any present purchaser's means, I am satisfied. I can only add that I have not the interest of one cent in these lands, but say what I really think for your guidance.

"Yours very truly,

GEO. M. MOWBRAY."

RICHMOND.

New York, Nov. 1, 1864.

Having bought the Wholesale and Retail BOOT AND SHOE establishment of Mr. EDWIN A. BROOKS, No. 150 Fulton Street (where I have carried on business for the last eleven years), I desire to inform my friends and the public in general that I shall continue the business on a strictly ONE-PRICE system.

Believing that the business can be conducted on the principles of truth and justice, I have given instructions to all persons in the employ never to misrepresent any article that is offered for sale.

I call your attention to manufacture and keep on hand a superior quality of goods, to serve from 5 to 25 per cent less than heretofore, and a still further reduction will be made as soon as the markets will admit.

Yours respectfully,
C. C. RICHMOND.

N.B.—The forman and employés of the former business remain with me.

MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE H. THOMAS.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 810.]

TWO PICTURES FROM THE WAR.

ALL through the wearying summer day,
The blaze of heat, the dusty road,
Our toiling columns stretch away,
Sore burdened with the knapsack's load—
And winding o'er the rugged hills
Bright waves of steel roll billowing on,
Till War's stern, solemn splendor fills
Dark valleys from the world withdrawn.

Day wanes apace · the failing feet
Have respite from the toilsome track,
Uncounted eyes in slumber sweet
Close round the watch-fire's ruddy glance.
The night-hawk skirts the distant wood,
And from the far-off summits glow
Dim warnings in the solitude,
The watch-fires of a crafty foe.

To-morrow's dawn may bring the strife,
The shock of battle; yet the sleep
That chains this throbbing tide of life
Is like a spell, so wild and deep,
Dreams sweep each stormy, turbulent breast,
The happy Past returns again,
Joy sits within the heart, a guest,
To banish hence corroding pain.

God guard and keep them! O'er the hills,
Far re ching to their Northern homes,
My yearning aspiration thrills,
And on the haunted night-wind comes
The whisper of a porch rose-twined,
A graveled walk, an open door,
A lattice sweetly jessamined—
A shadow falling on the floor!

Sad woman's eyes; and bearded lips
Beside the bivouac murmur low,
As if the dream had found eclipse
In sympathy's deep overflow.
The drowsy clock ticks by the wall
To count the listless hours away—
While rings afar the shrilling call
Of bugles sounding for the fray

Sweet childish faces gather round,
Sweet infant voices fill the room,
As ever greets her ear the sound
Of children's chatter—"When will he come?"
And she, with marble lip and cheek,
Turns shuddering from the shadowed floor
To stifle words she may not speak—
"Perhaps he comes to us no more!"

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1864.

THE SITUATION.

IT is December, but active war is still going on. The operations in Tennessee, SHERMAN'S march across Georgia, and the terrible tenacity of GRANT before Richmond, do not look much like winter-quarters. It is useless to speculate, and the Associated Press dispatches prophesy more than enough. That the rebels fight as fiercely as ever their general charges against the storm of death at Franklin shows That the Union soldiers have the stordiness that secures ultimate victory and the swiftness that baffles the most frenzied impetuosity was proved by the same battle. General THOMAS, who saved the day at Chickamauga when even ROSECRANS gave up all for lost, is a man in whose equality we may all confidently count. If HOOD fails in Tennessee, it will be an irreparable moral disaster to the rebellion.

OF SHERMAN there will probably be authentic news before these lines are read. We have not disguised the dangers and difficulties of his march, while we have felt very sure that nobody could measure them more accurately than the General himself. We have endeavored to be prepared for delay, and to face the chance of serious opposition to his progress, in view of the vital importance of such opposition to the rebels But if rebellion still means and summons every impediment he emerges safely and timely upon the coast. SHERMAN, too, will have won a moral victory which will shake the enemy's heart. And it is by moral victories that the advantages of military successes are secured.

As each of the three chief points of interest the prospects of the national cause are clearly encouraging to the most impartial survey, while the record of the year can not furnish the least hope or comfort to the rebellion. It is still in arms, indeed; it still contests. That is all that can be said for it. On the other hand, the nation has steadily advanced in the suppression of the insurrection, and has declared that it does not mean to hesitate or delay, or spare any cost of money, time, or precious life, to maintain its existence. It is not yet finally successful. It has not finished its work. But it is steadily finishing it, and Rome was not a failure because it was not built in a day.

We shall be very glad if we can contribute in any degree to promote a healthful condition of the public mind; guarding it equally against mad ecstasies and foolish depressions. The cause is not gained or lost by a battle nor by a campaign. The noblest cause defended by arms, and committed to the chances of war, can not have a campaign or unvarying success; and a nation which can not endure occasional defeat can not achieve permanent victory. We were children when the war began; we ought to be men now. There is every reason to anticipate that this year will end in glory for the country. Let us be calm, and patient, and grateful; neither intoxicated with the success we look for, nor in despair with the reverse that is always possible.

CONGRESS.

CONGRESS assembles under pleasant auspices. It is not in the dark. It can have no doubt. It has heard from the people. It knows what the country wishes and expects. It has had the plainest declaration that the Government is to be maintained by force of arms, and that there is to be no parley with rebels, except to receive their submission to the Constitution and the laws.

We do not anticipate any remarkable change in the conduct of those in the Opposition who, during the last session, had no other policy than impeding the Administration and paralyzing the efforts of the country to save itself. Gentlemen whose votes cheer the rebel Congress will still claim that they maintain a "legitimate opposition" to CHARLES JAMES FOX. "Democrats" who profess the profoundest respect for the popular will, will vote as if the election had gone exactly the other way. Representatives who are "in search of slavery as any body" will vote against allowing a constitutional chance of settling the question.

Fortunately these gentlemen are few The responsible majority of the present Congress, and a still larger one of the next, come fresh from the people, freshly inspired by the high and noble national impulse which has recorded itself in the late election. The very universality of the patriotic feeling will, we believe, chasten and moderate crudeness of legislation, because it is an assurance of ripeness and sagacity in the popular mind which does not require to be excited and spurred by abnormal action.

We have a right to expect great calmness, decision, and precision in the legislation of this winter.

THE "FLORIDA."

WE have forborne any remarks upon the seizure of the Florida, because the facts have been very inadequately stated, and because we were very sure that the question of title, so wisely adjusted the Trent case would be fully competent to deal with this. Indeed there has been no event during the war which more clearly proved the ability of the Government of State and the good sense of the country than the issue of the Trent difficulty. It would be hard to find in any history a more thorough acquiescence in a conclusion so adverse to the inflamed national passion and expectation as that case furnished. The general feeling upon all points of international law, or, more correctly speaking, agreement, was increased in the case of the Trent by the exact precedents of the public mind, still freshly chafing with indignation at the British prompt concession of belligerent rights to the rebels. But the moment the fine American tradition was stated and explained by Senator SUMNER and Secretary SEWARD, every man saw that the national honor demanded the surrender of the two rebel emissaries, and they were promptly surrendered without a murmur, and with the intelligent consent of the country.

The conduct of Lord PALMERSTON, the representative of the hostile British aristocracy, and the tone of the English hostile press, will not be forgotten while the name of Lord CHARLES BARING and the English press friendly to our cause will be always gratefully remembered. For a fortnight Lord PALMERSTON declined in Parliament an explanation of the readiness of the United States Government to do whatever honor and precedent required, and for a fortnight he and his friends did what they could to secure success to the rebellion by plunging the United States and Great Britain into war. Lord PALMERSTON, his press, and his friends, were willing to risk the fidelity of the United States to their own principles, even when that fidelity required a severe sacrifice of feeling.

In the present case, the seizure of the Florida in a neutral port is one of those acts of which British naval history is full. The English hostile press breaks out in the same kind of savage and revenge upon the report of an incident which has a myriad British precedents. A most competent and intelligent authority furnishes to the Boston Daily Advertiser an elaborate and careful paper recounting the various seizures of ships made at various times and in various ports of various nations by Britannia, ruler of the waves. The paper is worthy of enduring form and preservation as a comprehensive record of swaggering, blatant, bullying tone of the English press, and too often of British statesmen, which has earned for Great Britain the same kind of hearty hate which was felt for the United States while our Government was administered in the blustering and domineering spirit of Slavery. Upon one occasion a British fleet instructed the British Ministry to apologize to the Portuguese Government for a gross offense of the kind we are considering, but especially charged him that under no circumstances should he consent to restitution of the prize.

The obstreperous scolding of English hostile journals we have happily learned to despise; and certainly in the present instance no intelligent American can hear it without a smile of amused contempt. Unfortunately the sinking of the Florida has prevented the possibility of her restitution to Brazil, should that course have appeared to be required by our own precedent and by international understanding. It is greatly to be deplored that, since she was not destroyed in the act of seizure, she had not remained afloat until the question could be decided. If it shall now appear that the rights of a neutral had been violated by the Florida herself, the case, like that of the General Armstrong, will be one for friendly reference. If it shall be proved that her seizure was a plain violation of a neutral port, we have no doubt that every faithful American citizen expects that the most simple and immediate apology will be made. One newspaper indeed thinks that such a course would be a sore blow to the national honor! But that is more surprising in a paper which thinks that the duty of citizen to his country and Government ends with an election.

What all honest men desire is that justice shall be done to the injured State of Brazil, and honest men do not feel their honor wounded by frankly apologizing when they see that they are in the wrong.

A LETTER FROM GOLDWIN SMITH.

THE paper upon precedents of British offenses against neutrals, of which we have spoken in what we say of the Florida, is attributed, probably justly, to Senator SUMNER. It has elicited a letter from Goldwin Smith, dated Cornell, which was published in the Philadelphia North American. The reply is admirable for its temper, and for its assertion of a higher international morality than usually appears in such discussions.

Grant, says Professor SMITH, that what you say is true. Yet the offenses were mostly committed when you were parts of the British empire, and when her glory and shame were yours. And grant again that England has done such things as are not still unworthy—and that upon plead the shortcomings of England sixty, a hundred, or three hundred years ago as precedents for the extenuation of your own unworthy acts to-day? But her later assertions and conduct show that England has changed her feeling, and that such acts would not now be justified. And even if that were not so, is it a lofty course, in the present circumstances, to inflame ill-feeling between two countries because the violent in one loudly censure what the calmest and wisest in the other do not approve?

These questions come properly and forcibly from an Englishman who is in the fullest sympathy with us, and who feels how necessary to civilization is peace between America and England. And he, upon his side, will certainly understand that it is very agreeable for a nation, struggling as we are, to be savagely attacked because of an unauthorized act of a single officer in a foreign port, before the facts are known, and before the Government or public opinion have had a chance to express themselves; and that it is especially disagreeable coming from a maritime nation whose history is full of exactly such acts, and which boasts itself as the only nation not because of its regard for neutral rights, but from its great jealousy of our power and prosperity.

The motive of Professor SMITH'S letter, deprecation of hostility and hostile flame between England and the United States, will command the sympathetic approval of every sagacious and patriotic American, and he has earned the right to say what he does, because he has never hesitated to denounce in the boldest and most forcible strain the attempt of his own country in suffering herself to become the base of rebel principles upon our commerce. His hope is, as the hope of all true men must be, that the better theories and feelings in England will not allow themselves to be dragged into the mire of mere bravado and reciprocal insult.

RAILROAD TRAVEL.

IT will be shameful if the public attention now directed to the danger and discomfort of railway travel in this country does not lead to greater safety and convenience. There is at the present moment nothing more uncertain than a railway train. There is nothing regular upon the roads but irregularity. No traveler is now so wild as to expect to make connections. Every traveler is glad if he arrives two or three hours behind time with a whole skin. Every line is overcrowded with passengers and freight. The trains toil along from point to point, and patience never had so universal an opportunity for doing her perfect work. One hapless gentleman reports that he recently waited two hours at Utica upon the Central Road, reached New York two hours behind time upon the Hudson Road, and Boston four hours late upon the Massachusetts Central. The delays on the latter line now makes his arrangements to arrive a day late, and so insures himself against disappointment.

The delays would be more tolerable if comfort could be secured. But money loses its power when you take a train. Money will buy you comfort and seclusion every where else but in the cars. You may dine for fifty cents or five dollars at any restaurant; you may choose your hotel and your rooms in it, and be alone or in the crowd; but in the train you have no choice. Your money is banished and powerless. You must pay six dollars to go to Boston, or three dollars to Albany or Philadelphia; but you must sit back by jowl with drunkards and fanatics, and no amount of money that you would gladly pay can protect you. There are plenty of decent people with whom you would willingly sit, but you can not. You must sit with the fumes of whisky, you must hear the rhapsody of profanity and indecency, and thank God that your fingers have not yet been broken by the gracious Railroad Company.

A gentleman was lately traveling at night upon the New York Central Road with his wife, who was an invalid. A huge, hulking fellow came in and sat down by the stove and began to smoke a pipe. The smell and smoke were very unpleasant to the lady, and the gentleman, going to the smoker, mildly told him that smoking was not allowed in the car. The reply was a whiff. After a little time the gentleman asked the smoker if he would be kind enough to lay aside his pipe, as it made the lady sick. The reply was a surly grunt of refusal. Thereupon the gentleman knocked the pipe out of the smoker's mouth; and there would have been a serious row except for the timely entry of the conductor and the remonstrance of other passengers. The incident is not the exception, it is almost the rule. When the Central Railroad asks the Legislature this winter for the power to raise the rate of fare, why should not the Legislature require the Company to provide cars, because of different prices, that those who wish decency in travel, and who do not wish to sit with drunkards and blasphemers, can be accommodated? It is hotel, if people prefer the company of the barroom, they go there and sit; but what would be thought of a hotel which compelled every body to sit in the bar-room?

There are smoking-cars upon all the trains, says some railroad director. Very well, if people choose to smoke in the other end of a train, and to fight if you complain, it may be possible to carry the point after a struggle that the offensive party be put into the smoking car. Why not prevent the chance? A man may come into your room at a hotel with his pipe, but the chances are against it. The whole system is to what can be easily done to secure comfort. Why not have a drunken car instead of condemning all the passengers to the society of a set? Why not compel those upon whom the Railway describes a fellow marching up and down the car, flourishing his whisky-bottle and stumping every body who did not vote for MCCLELLAN to step forth and be chastised. The conductor did not even attempt to remove him.

There is no reason whatever why every railroad company should not be compelled to protect passengers from such discomfort. In England, and upon the continent of Europe, there are different kinds of cars, and the traveler is infinitely more comfortable than upon our higgledy-piggledy roads. The truth is, that our whole system of railroad travel, in point of safety and comfort, is entirely behind the age.

"REFORM IT ALTOGETHER."

MANY of the daily papers justly censure the absurd prophecies of the Associated Press that "General ——— is fully prepared for any force that the rebels can array against him," or the special dispatch which asserts that "a gentleman has just arrived who declares that the fate of Richmond was sealed if the plans of General THOMAS," all of which remarks were tolerable enough before the battle of Bull Run, three years ago last July, but have been simply silly ever since.

But while the papers justly censure such folly, why do they print it? If they omitted it they would gain both the space occupied by the silly dispatch and by their own indignant comments upon it, while its publication merely depresses the public mind, which has learned to look in these foolish boasts of the Associated Press dispatches only the most frightened whistling to keep up courage. Does the public let every newspaper omit them, and we shall all be gainers.

LITERARY.

"THE Journal and Letters of Samuel Curwen," edited by G. A. WARD (LITTLE & BROWN), is a new edition of a work published some years since. Mr. CURWEN was a Colonial Tory who left Salem, in Massachusetts, where he was an Admiralty Judge, after the battle of Lexington, and went to Philadelphia; but finding that patriotism was inconveniently hot in that city, after being singed a little, he embarked for England, and remained there until after the close of the war. He was sixty years old when he left his country, and an old man when he returned to America. His journal is the record of the foreign residence of the Tory refugees during the Revolution, and is full of interesting details of the English life and men of that time. Mr. CURWEN was evidently a prim, precise Puritan, by no means cast in the heroic mould. But a lover of his native land and a very sagacious observer of events, as his letters, no less than the diary, show. It was no light trial to be torn away from his home, his wife, his position, his fortune, his long habits of methodical comfort, at an age when most men abhor change, and to be thrust out over the ocean, friendless, poor, and in extremely low spirits. His spirits indeed were permanently low, and it is from the bed of his dry, cold inventory of the famous places and objects he saw, which he lots down as a man in unhappy circumstances mechanically repeats a prayer, totally unconscious of the words. The book is a curious and valuable sidelight in the history of that time.

To a wide circle it has a peculiar interest also from the name of its editor, GEORGE ARVINSON WARD. Mr. WARD was a descendant of Judge CHIEVER, and very recently, after this handsome volume was in print. He was perhaps to his death the best living representative of the old Puritan County Federalist. His hostility to "TOM JEFFERSON" was as earnest in 1864 as that of the Hartford Convention in 1814; and his familiar knowledge of our political history and men made him a most entertaining and instructive companion. Mr. WARD was one of the most genial and generous of men. He had the simplicity of a child with the courtesy of a gentleman of the old school. He could not bear the victorious cheerfulness of his nature, nor his faith in noble principles, nor his patriotic fidelity. He encountered and overcame sad many misfortunes with unquerulous patience, and toward the end of his life, after more than one warning of a sudden death, which he received undismayed, he returned to his native place, and at once sympathizing in all its interests, a good citizen and a true, kind, gentle-hearted man, he was busy to the very last, and upon returning to his home one weeks since from a flower-show, sank quietly asleep, and was seen of men no more.

"The Autobiography of Lieutenant-General Scott" (SHELDON). This is a work which has been awaited with curious expectation. The author has been one of our historic men for half a century. He has been upon familiar terms with many of our most famous men. He has been often behind the scenes, and now as the curtain is finally falling upon his own part the veteran actor steps to the front and makes his farewell speech. There is something pathetic in the position which invites criticism. As the eye falls upon him the spectator remembers the services he has performed, recalls the good intentions rather than the inadequate fulfilment, and as the player leaves the stage is disposed to bid him a kindly farewell. We do not, let not how silently and retire? Why should he speak who can not speak wisely? Why publish a book which if not written at all is a unutterable relief if mentioned must be described truly? And the simple truth is, that this is one of the most unsatisfactory books ever published. It has none of the especial charm of memoirs, that delightful, genial picture of the private lives of public men and relation of characteristic incident which, if properly literary dinlaia to note, is yet the most delightful episode of history. The book tells in a dreary way what was already known of its author's services but as a picture of American life and men during the long life of General Scott it is worthless. We prefer remarks the want in our literature of proper personal memoirs, and the work then proceeds to two volumes to make at least what more stupid and deplorable. The book will not injure the national gratitude to the aged hero for his faithful and undoubted patriotic service; it will be merely counted among those acts which all his sincere friends will regret and the country hastens to forget.

"From Dan to Beersheba: Travels in the Holy Land," by REV. J. WYCLIFFE PUTNAM, D.D. (CARLETON). A simple, earnest, valuable book, describing Jerusalem and the whole tour in the Holy Land, both as careful and full as its details and descriptions that it is an admirable vade-mecum for the traveller and a capital manual of reference for the student. Nevertheless we think an attack of the Bedouins upon his party, sixteen against four, in which the clerical author and friends showed themselves to be efficient doctors of the Church Militant. Every Eastern traveler will turn the pages of this modest and well-illustrated volume with peculiar interest.

"Margaret Denzil's History" (HARPERS) is one of those stories which are so good that we are sorry of them before we read them. This one has excited so much interest as it appeared serially that, as it came complete, it must be found for so remarkable a tale. It has been attributed to several noted persons, but we believe, with others, by QUEEN VICTORIA. But it is very clear that if that good lady had been capable of writing such a book she would not have waited until now to reveal her power. "Margaret Denzil's History" is doubtless a woman's book, and one of those which must be read by every one who would be familiar with the remarkable mystery of literary power which, in our day, seeks its expression in the novel.

"Under the Sun" (Le Mondit) (HARPERS) is another vegetarian novel. It is a highly-wrought, exciting, even exasperating tale, descriptive of the subtle influence and the inexorable method of Jesuitism. For the information reader it has an authoritative interest, and for every reader a profound warning.

"The Seer; or, Common Places Refreshed," by LEIGH HUNT (ROBERTS BROTHERS). This is a fresh and truly beautiful edition of one of the most delightful series of essays in English literature. They are genial, dainty, delicate little treatises upon familiar topics and daily experiences, graced with all the charms of the poet's fancy, and garnished with the spoils of the most exquisite culture which is marked in LEIGH HUNT. The publishers will be certainly thanked for giving so fair a form to so choice a work, and so timely and fit for a gift-book.

"Arizona and Sonora: the Geography, History, and Resources of the Silver Region of North America," by SYLVESTER MOWRY, of ARIZONA. (HARPERS.) A compact, plain, and detailed account of the mineral resources of the region, given often in the words of the official authorities. It is full of useful and apparently accurate information.

THERE COMES A TIME.

THERE comes a time when we grow old,
And, like a sunset down the sea,
Slopes gradual, and the night wind cold
Comes whispering and and chillingly;
And then the gray
At Winter's day,
And eyes of saddest blue behold
The leaves all frosty fall away,
And lips of faded coral say,
There comes a time when we grow old.

There comes a time when joyous hearts,
Which leap as leap the laughing main,
Are dead to all its mirthful parts,
As prisoner in his dungeon chain,
And dawn of day
And night are one,
The moon hath into darkness rolled,
And by the embers wan and gray,
I hear a voice in whisper say,
There comes a time when hearts grow old.

There comes a time when manhood's prime
Is shrouded in the mist of years,
And beauty, fading like a dream,
Hath passed away in silent tears;
And thought grows dark!
But oh! the spark
That kindles youth to hues of gold,
Still lingers in the heart and may pay,
And fond affections lingering say,
There comes a time when we grow old.

There comes a time when laughing Spring
And golden Summer cease to be;
And we put sober robe
To tread the last declivity.
But now the slope,
Which leads
Beyond the sunset we behold—
Another dawn with fairer light,
While wafted from above through the night
There comes a time when we grow old.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, December 5, the Thirty-eighth Congress assembled at Washington to hold its second and last session. In the Senate the Chaplain officiated. After prayer by the Chaplain, and after the usual notice to the House that the Senate was ready for business, the credentials of Mr. Nathan A. Farwell, appointed to fill Mr. Fessenden's unexpired term, were presented, sworn to, and he was duly sworn into office. It was received that the President of the United States could not attend as ordered. Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, offered a bill authorizing the construction of a railroad bridge over Wyoo on the lakes, and appropriating for that purpose one million dollars. Mr. Lane introduced a bill to prohibit the payment from the Treasury of the Kansas militia, who had been employed in the suppression of Indian outbreaks.

In the House, 180 members answered to their names at the commencement of the session. Messrs. Colfax, Blair, and Fenton, were appointed by the committee from the House, conjointly with a committee from the Senate, to wait on the President and inform him that both Houses were ready to receive any communication he might have to make. Mr. Ashley, of Ohio, introduced a bill to repeal Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, and tier over. Mr. Ca. Sumner, of Illinois, offered a resolution instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of repealing the tariff on coffee, sugar, tea, and similar articles. On motion of Mr. Colfax, the Committee on Appropriations was tabled, 68 to 49. Mr. Morrill, of Vermont, offered a resolution directing the Committee of Ways and Means to be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing a sinking fund to pay off the whole indebtedness of the public debt. Mr. Washburne offered a resolution to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill to repeal the Revenue bill at all, to lay a tax on all stocks of dealers imported into the United States.

The only changes which have taken place since the last session in the Committees of the House are as follows: Mr. Blair takes the place of James Bayard, resigned, for Maryland; Mr. Dawes, Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, resigned; Mr. Anderson, for Mr. Rollins, resigned; Mr. Hooper, for Mr. Bailey, deceased; and Bowden does not return. Bowden, together with Vallandigham, was arrested for treason. The two Senators from Louisiana are R. K. Cutler and Charles Smith. The Senators from Tennessee are Andrew Johnson and Lovejoy, deceased, for Illinois; Samuel Knox that of Missouri, Jos., resigned, for Missouri. Mr. Lovejoy succeeded that of Sheldon, for New York. Governor Fenton holds his seat until the commencement of the extraordinary session.

The appointment by the President of the Hon. Salmon P. Chase for Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court, in place of the late Chief-Justice Taney, deceased, has been received by the Senate December 6, and immediately confirmed.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The President's Message was transmitted to Congress December 6. It is a very long document, and commences: The President regrets the condition of our Foreign affairs as reasonably satisfactory, and proceeds to refer to his last at length on our relations with the South American States. Alluding to the disturbance of the Republic of Mexico by a feeble authority to furnish the republic with a gun-boat to assist in suppressing the rebellion, he says that he has given its operations in arresting the slave-trade. The President briefly alludes to the two projects to connect America with Europe, the one by sea and the other by land, as satisfactorily under way. His refers to the temporary difficulties which, after the decease of Consul-General Thayer, resulted in a suspension of diplomatic intercourse with the United States; to the suppression of the Chinese rebellion, and the opening of the Japanese ports to trade, mentioning that the ports of Norfolk, Fernandina, and Pensacola have been thrown open to the world, he proceeds to the consideration of the difficulties on the Canadian border. He recommends that notice be given to the British Government that after the expiration of six months the United States must feel at liberty to increase their naval armament upon the Lakes, if they shall find it necessary to do so.

The President also recommends an amendment of the act for the encouragement of emigration which shall prevent the practice of fraud against immigrants on their way hither or on their arrival in port, so as to secure them a free choice of occupations and places of settlement. He reports that the enterprise for connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific States by a railroad through with a view which gives promise of success, notwithstanding the embarrassments arising from the want of labor and means. The route of the main line of the road has been definitely located for over 1,000 miles westward from the initial point at Omaha City, Nebraska; and a preliminary location of the branch uniting San Francisco with the road from Sacramento, eastward, to the great bend of Mucker River. The probable early development of gold, silver, and cinnabar mines have been added to the many inducements for the construction of the road. Between Nevada and Rocky Mountains and the subordinate ranges lyond State organizations, which a richly repay exploration.

It is believed that the products of the mines of precious metals in that region have, during the year, reached, if not exceeded, $100,000,000 in value.

The President recommends that further attention be given to the reorganization of the Indian system.

The number of invalid pensioners is 28,479, of which 710 are from the Navy. The number of widows and orphans on the Army Pension Rolls is 28,445, the Navy pensioners numbering 1,121. The claims pending June 30, 1864, $4,864,615 have been paid to pensioners of all classes.

The President refers to the General Statement, which through Georgia as an evidence of our great increase of relative strength. Over 30,000 citizens residing in each of the States of Arkansas and Louisiana have organized loyal State governments and framed constitutions, which in movements in a similar direction should not be overlooked. In Maryland an election for State officers will occur next year.

The President congratulates the country on the fact that the number of votes cast at the election in the loyal portion of the country is greater than the corresponding number in 1860, by 800,000, notwithstanding the depleted condition who could not vote and the hugely augmented population of the Territories. He also points out that the recovery of the nation in respect of men are not in any measure exhausted by the war.

Negotiations for peace with the insurgent leader the President announces, have failed. He says that he has distinctly and frequently declared that he would accept of no terms inconsistent with the Union. We are in fact thus to the issue of war. When the Southern people are beaten by the sword they will return from the field and submit to the debate of their leaders, then peace will follow upon "terms." In regard to the Emancipation Proclamation, the President says that no change by legislation or by decision of the courts shall be made in the conditions which shall fix the status of the Slave. The Government could not, if it would, maintain war against them.

Upon the question of the Rights of Labor, the President should remain, we would subject them by the peaceful means of Emancipation, courts, and bonds."

In taking this position the President declares that he retracts nothing heretofore said by him as to slavery. He repeats his former declaration that he will not attempt, while he remains in the Executive office, to return, or to modify the Emancipation Proclamation. "Nor," adds he, "shall I return to slavery any person who has been free by the terms of that Proclamation, or by any of the acts of Congress.

"If the people should, by whatever mode or means, make it an executive duty to re-enslave such persons, another, and not I, must be their instrument to perform it.

"In stating a single condition of peace, I mean simply to say that the war will cease on the part of the Executive whenever it shall have ceased on the part of those who began it."

The President recommends that Congress should take early measures for the payment before the State Legislatures the proposition for an amendment to the Constitution which has been before the people for consideration for a recent election to have indicated a desire on the part of the people that such amendment should be adopted.

The proposition came up at the last session, and was carried in the Senate by a vote of 38 to 6, but was not in the House, receiving only 95 votes against 66; a two-thirds majority is required. Twenty-four members of the House did not vote at all.

REPORTS OF THE DEPARTMENTS.

The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury accompanied the President's Message.

The fiscal year ended July 1, 1864. The receipts during the year from all sources, including loans and the balance in the Treasury at the commencement of the year, were $1,394,796,007 69; the disbursements, $1,393,056,159 08, leaving a balance in the Treasury of $39,739,848 61. Deduct from these amounts the amount of the principal of the public debt redeemed, viz., the issues of loans in substitution therefor, and the actual cash operations of the Treasury amounted to $1,242,315,456,647 61; disbursements, $865,434,667 93; which leaves a cash balance in the Treasury of $39,739,848 61. Of the receipts, there were derived from customs $105,316,169 99; from lands, $588,333 79; from direct taxes, $475,649 80; from internal revenue, $109,741,134 19; from miscellaneous sources, $1,021,845 39; from loans applied to the part of the balance, including former balance, $623,643,929 13. There were disbursements for the civil service, $17,305,076 66; pensions and Indians, $1,517,930 97; for the army for the year ending June 30, 1864, $690,791,604 93; for navy, $85,735,329 79; for interest of the public debt, $53,685,017 15; making an aggregate of $1,393,056,159 08, and leaving a balance in the Treasury of $18,949,058 71, as before stated.

The Secretary of the Treasury favors an increase of taxation sufficient to pay the war. The entire expenditure to July 1, 1864, was $1,740,000,469 49. The Secretary is of the opinion that the whole of the debt may be paid by banks of loans not authorized by Congress.

The Report of the Secretary of War has not been received.

The Secretary of the Navy reports that including the vessels under construction December 1, 1864, there are 588 vessels, mounting 4,610 guns, carrying 510,396 tons, being an actual increase during the year of 29 vessels, 467 guns, and 71,396 tons. Of the 588 vessels, 161 are iron-clads, carrying 1,587 guns, and 236 are now in the naval service, including officers and men, 51,558. During the year 264 vessels, and the whole number during the year 324 vessels, and the whole number captured or destroyed by the enemy captured, and not to be reported. The total expenditure of the Navy Department for the year ending June 30, including the cost of the insurance squadrons that have been called into existence to turn the city of Mexico, is the sum of $85,734,329 79, and less $258,667,102 93.

The Secretary recommends the construction of a new navy-yard and suitable establishment for the construction of iron-clad vessels. He also recommends the construction of the rank of Vice-Admiral in our naval service.

The total expenditure of the Navy during July 1, 1864, amounted to $19,268,955 78, and the expenditure to $15,644,329 79, leaving a balance of $3,624,625 99.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.

The news from Sherman is still indefinite: indeed it is impossible that it should be otherwise while he is beside his main army with any degree of accuracy. The Mayor of Milledgeville says that the Yankee army has despoiled the citizens of food, and has taken their mules and horses. He also reports the destruction of the railroad bridge and the bridge across the Oconee. The State House and Executive Mansion were saved. There is no certain information that Sherman has moved his main army east of the Oconee, but the report of the burning of his bridges reached Milledgeville. The Richmond Enquirer of December 1, on the other hand, says that Sherman had reached Millen. The Richmond Enquirer of December 1, on the other hand, says that Sherman had reached Millen. It declared he opinion that he would reach the coast in safety. The Richmond Examiner, two days afterward, denied the report and predicted Sherman's defeat. It is impossible for us to say whether Sherman's main army is east of the Oconee, or whether the attacks that side of the stream are merely blinds made by the cavalry, while the main body is moving between the Oconee and the Ocmulgee toward Brunswick. In the late case it has been a long journey to Millen line, and the route is more unfavorable than the country usually selected.

An expedition under General Foster sailed from Port Royal on the 1st inst., and on the 2d entered Broad River, down to Boyd's Point, where a force was landed which proceeded five miles inland to the Charleston and Charleston Railroad, which runs from Charleston to Savannah and Charleston to Augusta. The object of the expedition was to co-operate with Sherman. The expedition was under the command of General Orlando Brannan, Colonels Read and Harden, which they represent as having been a dreary battle.

GENERAL GREGG'S RAID.

On the 1st of December General Gregg started southward on a reconnoissance, with the object of avoiding the rebel right. He Stopped Stony Creek Station, taking two prisoners, who he released, and ten belonged prisoners, and destroying large quantities of property, including 200 cords of wood.

BATTLE OF FRANKLIN.

HOOD'S army fronted Nashville on the 1st of November. Up to this date Forrest had remained on the Tennessee River, in the neighborhood of Savannah, while the main body of Hood's army was in the vicinity of Florence and Tuscumbia, the line at Corinth, the base of supply, amounting to from 18,000 to 15,000, moved westward, Hood at the same time moving northward. Both columns by this advance finished our positions at Decatur, Huntsville, and Athens, which were evacuated on the 25th. Thomas's army falling back on Columbia, 45 miles north of Nashville, the 5th the 23d Army Corps crossing Duck River between our cavalry and General Forrest, the latter having reported with the body of the infantry. The enemy time Hood was moving past our left northward across the Duck River, crossing at Davis's Ford, 15 miles from Columbia, who was at Columbia, from Nashville. He had crossed Duck River by the 26th. As soon as the fact was discovered Schofield continued the retreat from Columbia toward Nashville, the 23d Corps moving on Spring Hill, Thomas following. Wood was Hood's pursuit that Forrest caught up with Schofield at Spring Hill on the 29th. A severe fight followed, in which Wilson, united by a portion of Schofield's command, and Forrest, vainly tried to bring on a general engagement, but our force withheld to Forrest's attack in order to retain the Big Harpeth River, and 18 miles south from Nashville. The next day, November 30, the battle of Franklin was fought. Schofield determined to wrest attack before crossing the river. Franklin is on the south bank of the river. The river the army being drawn up in a semicircle like around Franklin, Schofield's line of battle was formed behind the strong fort on the north side of the stream. His army consisted of the Fourth, Twenty-third, and Twenty-third under Cox: the former held the right, the latter the left, and the 23d the centre. Cox's Corps and Riley's of Stanley's connected, forming the centre. The cavalry consisted of Wilson's corps, under Cheatham, Stewart, and Lee. These corps attacked the centre and left of our line. The attack at first was made chiefly on the centre. Charge after charge was made, ending in failure. In the repulse of these the Major-General Cheatham was killed; in another fell Brigadier-General Adams, and in the same charge Brigadier-General Gist and dreadful than such as we have ever known. NEWS ITEMS.

A few weeks since a party of rebels, duly commissioned by J. R. Anderson, Confederate Secretary of War, organized a conspiracy for the destruction of our commerce on the Pacific. The plot, laid by Thomas Harris, consisting of about twenty men, left Havana at the close of September, in the steamer Georgiana, and, after touching at Nassau on the Guatemala, one of the Panama Railroad line of steamers, and sailed Panama. They arrived at Panama on late, but determined to visit the Saturday, which would leave Panama on the 1st of October. They were detained at sea and then use her or a privateer against vessels of the fortie 42d parallel of latitude. Before the time their conspiracy became known to our officers, and when the party had left Panama, the plan so carefully concerted had been completed for their capture. When the vessel left Panama it had been learned that the steamer had the United States steamer Lancaster, under Commander Dove, in port, who was ordered to watch the suspicious vessel. Among those Thomas Hogg, Brigadier-General of Texas, and Colonel Thomas Harris. The remaining accused officers have been accepted bail by the President, to which Mr. Lincoln assented. General John A. McClernand, Brigadier-General of U. S. A., has resigned his commission.

Mr. A. W. Thayer has been appointed Consul of Trieste in the place of Consul Hitchcock, late, deceased, obliged to resign on account of ill health.

The Secretary of the Navy was found in one of the berths of the Second steamer City of New London, supposed to have been placed there by some person. Jane Irvine the vessel started from New York. The fine had been landed, but fortunately became extinguished before ignition of the targets was effected.

General Hood, with a large force of cavalry, is thoroughly clearing out guerrillas from Loudon County, Virginia, destroying every mill, barn, and house in which or hotels, and effectually breaking up the rebel plans for raising the Stars and Bars.

General Banks has returned to New Orleans to resume command of the Department of the Gulf.

General Humphrey has assumed command of the Second Corps, on relief from duty to General Hancock. Reporters report that General Ewell's Corps has gone southward.

FOREIGN NEWS.

GREAT BRITAIN.

FENIAN MULLER, the murderer, was executed November 26. Up to the last moment he protested his innocence. His ghostly adviser, who was one of the priests that just before condemned by the Judge, and the reports that just before Muller was swung off he confessed to the murder in these words: "I am the murderer: I have done it."

GREECE.

The new Constitution passed the Assembly November 1. The discussion had been protracted to such a length that the Assembly finally decided to vote only in and inform the wrongdoer that if they did not complete their work in a specified time they would exercise their liberty of action, throwing the responsibility on the Assembly. He also advocated the creation of a Council of State to take the place of the suppressed Senate. Indeed, his ministers declared that the King would sign the Constitution only on this condition. The royal order had the effect, and the King's proposal was adopted by a vote of 111 to 15.

BRAZIL.

Our Consul-General at Rio Janeiro on the 14th of October solemnized the marriage of Miss Ward to Miss Viera, Brazilian Secretary of Foreign Affairs, offering ample reparation for the capture of the Florida by Captain Collins.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN M. SCHOFIELD.

GENERAL JOHN M. SCHOFIELD.

GENERAL JOHN M'ALLISTER SCHOFIELD, who commanded the Federal troops engaged in the recent battle at Franklin, was born in Chautauqua County, New York, in 1831. He graduated at West Point in 1853, and his present rank in the regular army is Captain of Artillery. He was at an early period of the war connected with the operations in Missouri. He was with General LYON at the battle of Wilson's Creek. Upon the removal of General CURTIS he was placed in command of the Department of Missouri. Early in 1864 he was removed to allay dissatisfaction which had grown up in his department and transferred to East Tennessee. He took a prominent part in General SHERMAN'S summer campaign; and when the latter started upon his grand march through Georgia, he was left with General THOMAS to assist in the campaign against General HOOD. General SCHOFIELD, in his conduct of the retreat of our forces upon Nashville, has given fresh evidence of his distinguished ability as a soldier. The battle at Franklin was forced upon him by the pressure on his rear of a rebel force outnumbering his own command, and little time was afforded him for defensive preparations. But he succeeded in gaining a signal victory, and so severely punishing the enemy that his retreat was continued without molestation. It is impossible to say what the result of a defeat might have been.

GENERAL DAVID S. STANLEY.

GENERAL DAVID S. STANLEY.

GENERAL DAVID S. STANLEY, who so notably distinguished himself in the battle of Franklin, is a native of Ohio. In the year 1861 he fought in Missouri, and in the subsequent year followed the advance of our Western armies, after the capture of New Madrid and Island No. 10, into Mississippi. In the battle of Corinth he led the brilliant charge which crowned the victory of the day. In the battle of Franklin two corps were engaged, the Fourth and the Twenty-third. The latter was commanded by General COX; the former, under General STANLEY, held the right. It was on the right and centre that the heavy shock of the battle fell. The two brigades holding the centre were WAGNER'S of the Fourth and RILEY'S of the Twenty-third Corps. CHEATHAM'S entire corps of the rebel army, supported by LEE'S, fell upon this portion of our line in repeated charges, and at last, after several repulses, broke through. Two of the rebel leaders had already fallen, CLEBURNE and ADAMS. The centre broken, Colonel OPDYKE'S brigade, which lay behind in reserve, confronted the enemy's advance. STANLEY came up at this crisis, and ordered OPDYKE to restore the broken line. The advancing rebels were attacked in flank, and many of them captured. General STANLEY, while leading OPDYKE'S brigade to the charge, was wounded severely but not dangerously.

MARGARET MILLER.

A STORY IN NINE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

WE were the last of our family, and Robert was an invalid.

Looking up from the cluster of purple grapes I was embroidering on a pair of slippers for him, one early October day, he said,

"There are real grapes down in the meadow, Margy; suppose we take a walk."

"Agreed."

Dropping the worsted work, I was ready in a moment.

We went out through the kitchen entrance, cautioned by Aunt Hannah not to stroll too far. In the orchard near the apple-trees, where we breath their burden of red and golden fruit, swept the ground on either side, awaiting the autumnal harvester. They spoke silently of our white-haired father, who, since the last autumn, had been gathered to the heavenly harvest. They were his trees, planted by his own hands. "Who, in the coming years, would eat the fruit of his labor?" I reflected sorrowfully, and attempted to hide a tear by stooping to pick up a winter apple.

"Throw it away, sister; it is too hard."

"It is not the apple which is too hard, Robert," I replied, choking with my ill-timed words.

"Don't, Margy!"

He took the hand which had just dropped the apple and said,

"What a pleasant day it is! How brightly the sun shines here in the valley! And, above the hills yonder, who ever saw them robed so royally!"

Royal indeed they looked in their forest garments of crimson, gold, and purple. For the time my thoughts were diverted.

"Fringed gentians!" I exclaimed, as we passed the meadow stile. "Look, Robert! They are my autumn favorites; coming with the frost, as though they would comfort the earth for the loss of her summer flowers. I used to have a fancy that angels sowed the seed of the fringed gentian."

I was an enthusiast amidst the flowers of every season. Often in childhood I had run reverently to kiss the first spring livervort or blue violet; and all my life since I have loved them, in sorrow and in joy; and hope to love them still, and recognize my earthly favorites when I pass the "dark river" to the land of flowers.

Robert smiled, either at the warmth of my words or the simplicity of the fancy. His was a calmer, less mature than mine. Sometimes serenely amidst the droughts and overflows of life, like a rich river fed from unfailing springs.

"I think this a very pretty flower," he said, pulling a spike of the wax-like neottia. I am no botanist, Margy, but why is not this an orchis?"

"Because it is only an orchid, I suppose," said, "and favors an orchis just as you and Cousin Lib Hazel favor each other. She has the broad forehead and Roman nose of the Millers, while her other features are ubi generis. Look here! That neottia is an orchis just as the splendid cardinal-flower is a campanula. Some botanist will call them both scrophulaceæ."

We went forward slowly, talking as we went of the natural resemblances and distinctive features of plants, until we came to Spring Brook.

"I want to carry you over," Robert said; "but you are a little too heavy for me now. We must go along to the stepping-stones."

The grape-vine was on a small island formed by a division of the current. Smooth stones had been planted in the stream by my brothers when boys, to facilitate the passage to and from the island. We could go nowhere but some memorial of one of them was visible.

The rich odor of the grapes regaled us from afar.

"I know there are a plenty," I said, hastening forward to the natural arbor formed by the alders and wild grape-vine. "Oh, Robert! there never were so many before!"

His cheeks were crimson, and his eyes shone with an unwonted lustre as he entered the shady inclosure. I mistook it for pleasant excitement.

I declare, brother, you are better for the walk already! And do look at the grapes! Won't Aunt Hannah's eyes stare when she comes to see them and count over her jars of preserve-jelly and marmalade!"

"They are very fine," was his quiet remark, as he threw himself wearily down on the mossy grass. "Can you get as many on a stem with out my assistance?"

"Not as many as I can carry home."

I had only a small hand-basket. To fill it was the work of a few minutes only. Then I gathered the ripest, fairest clusters I could find for Robert, who I knew would never recline so indolently but for weariness and weakness.

We sat in the meadow eating the grapes and watching the sun as it peered through the vine-leaves and shamed among the alders, which already stretched their shadows across the stream to the green meadow beyond.

"The afternoon are getting shorter and cooler, Margy. Shall we go?"

We arose and walked homeward very slowly. Robert leaned more on me than on his staff.

"Dear-a-me, children, 'tis gittin' late, and too cold for Robert, I'm afraid. 'Tis clear as a bell, though; and a grain of white frost wouldn't surprise me none to-morrow morning."

Aunt Hannah's prophecy was correct. There was frost next morning, feathery and white on the lowlands. I knew it before I arose. My hangs seemed pierced with a hundred minute spears.

The fire burned cheerfully in the breakfast room, as it burned the evening before. We tried to be cheerful too, and to speak and act as usual. But the night, with its sore anguish, had been only a dream. Breakfast over, I sat down to put the finishing touch to Robert's slippers, while he read the paper—not aloud, for he was too hoarse to speak much above a whisper.

"Margy, listen to this advertisement," he said, after a period of silence:

"FOR NEW ORLEANS.—TOUCHING AT HAVANA AND KEY WEST—The new steam-ship Republic, Commodore Jones, will leave next month, as previously announced.

"How would you like a sea-voyage, and a letter at the South?"

"Better than any thing in the world, Robert! I am sorrowful now with the thought sprung a new hope for my brother. "Why have we not thought of it before? I am certain it would cure you. Shall I write to-day?"

"I believe it would be of more lasting benefit to you than to me, Margy. We will think about it."

All day the subject was discussed. In the evening we told Aunt Hannah we had decided to sail from New York in five days. She made no first surprise she appeared to approve the plan, and entered into our arrangements heartily. She said, with a hint of a tremble in her voice, every thing snug before winter set in, and get the farming all started in the spring against our return.

Aunt Hannah had managed every thing since our father's death, and was more faithful to our interest than to her own.

We were far from rich, but had bank-stock sufficient for our simple expenses and more; there would be no mortgage on the farm.

The new idea possessed me entirely, and lifted me quite above anxiety and despondency. The traveling trunks were brought forward and packed almost as cheerfully as though the winter journey were to restore at least instead of a pilgrimage for health. Only when Aunt Hannah insisted on a little roll of flannel, or a bundle of sacks of fresh herbs, I smiled, she said, would my heart sink for a moment.

"I just know, had we better let it go, Robert?" I asked, aside.

He answered, "Of course."

Careful Aunt Hannah! Often had we to bless her wise foresight when far away.

The last day at home was sad, in spite of our best efforts to be cheerful. Neighbors came to offer assistance and kind wishes, and though their words were as encouraging as possible, something in their looks and tones made me almost regret the step we were taking. They had been there the good God did not permit me to outrage the faithful heart which had borne our burdens for years, and I thank Him for it.

She did not weep, but was more than strange in my manner, but sat with her mind apparently absorbed in thoughts as far removed from her hurrying as mine were from her quiet peace and joy. My wayward heart softened with silence, and when I left she suggested it was growing late, and asked if she should call Robert in, now reduced to a few brands, I only answered. I was not ready, could not speak to him to-night.

How long I sat watching the fading of those brands to embers I can not tell. Not a sound was in the house except Aunt Hannah's step, unyielding cough from the room above, magnified by the solemn quietude of the night, and shutting out every other sound. "Could I not pray for peace of mind?" suggested a compassionate angel. "Could not I pray for Robert?"

Pray? On my bended knees I should have uttered only blasphemies. I would have said, "Unequal are thy dispensations, O thou cruel, evil, Sovereign of the Universe! Thou knowest we have not wronged Thee, that Thou shouldst thus load us with disappointments, while others are crowned with blessings!"

I assumed no attitude of prayer. The "eye that sees in secret," and knows all the thoughts and intents of the heart," marked all the scorn and irreverence of mine. At that moment I was far before arrayed itself against Infinite Goodness.

Only gray ashes lay like a mould on the hearthstone when I arose and went to my little room, my chamber, shading the light as I went, lest its rays should shine into my brother's room. I opened a moment—all was silent. I would have gone in and pressed a kiss upon his lips, but feared to disturb him. Not against him, my dear, noble brother, was my heart hardened, but against our Father in heaven!

I lay down, but not to sleep. I heard a choking sound, like a restrained sob; then a smothered cough, which soon burst forth with more violence from the very effort to check it. Rising with nervous energy I ran across the hall, and the next moment, with my arms clasped firmly around him, exclaimed,

"This is too bad! God knows it is wicked and cruel! My poor, darling brother!"

"Margy! oh, Margy! don't say such things," he said, faintly, at the same time laying his head upon my shoulder, as I knelt beside him. "Our ways are weak; but God is strong, and wise, and good!"

Had any one else made the assertion at that moment I would have disputed it, but could not distress him further with my impiety.

"Are you weary, Robert?" I whispered.

With the words my heart melted, and tears gushed forth in torrents. Robert wept too, and folded his arms tenderly around me. It was the first time our hearts had opened to one another in all our grief.

Aunt Hannah's prophecy was correct. There was frost next morning, feathery and white on the lowlands. I knew it before I arose. My hangs seemed pierced with a hundred minute spears.

CHAPTER II.

We made no stay at Havana. After taking a slow passage through the Gulf stream we had decided to go to Key West without change of steamer. If we did not like there, we could go on to New Orleans or return to Cuba. We had learned in New York that an old and valued friend of our father's was stationed at Fort Taylor as post surgeon. We were sure of our father's friend; and the welcome accorded by the kind physician and his family proved we were right.

Key West is one of the largest of the innumerable little islands that encircle the southern coast of Florida. Its name is said to be a corruption of the Spanish Coy Huesso or Isle of Bones. The Key is a coral formation, about five miles in length, and a mile or so in width. The waters all around the island are of a beautiful emerald tint, contrasting strongly with the deep blue of the ocean beyond. Fort Taylor, on the southwest point of the Key, is built of brick, with a foundation of solid stone-work. Three sides of this strong fortress, semi-hexagonal in form, are washed by the sea, while the diameter, or the side facing the island, is also separated from the land by a wide ditch, through which the tide flows constantly. The city is nothing more than a country-looking town, half-hidden in groves of cocoa-nut trees. It promised abundant repose of the very kind we needed—repose blended with novelty. We were pleased with the place at first sight, and determined to remain.

That evening found us comfortably established at the garrison hotel, seated out upon its wide veranda, and conversing with Doctor M'I——— on the distracted condition of the country and the prospects of a civil war. He was an unswerving Unionist; so was Judge M———, and a few others also, to whom we were subsequently introduced. But it did not take long to discover that on this little island, beneath the flag of Fort Taylor, were men busy in sowing the seeds of political discord and rebellion.

For a time Robert seemed to gain strength, and our daily rides and drives over the island were delightful. The flower-garden to me were a rich source of pleasure. Such a profusion of roses, jessamines, and crape myrtles I was certain was never seen elsewhere. The lowliest cabins were embowered in blooms, and for the first time in my life I had leisure to satiety. I sometimes fancied their ceaseless perfume a disgust to Robert, who once remarked, when we were sitting, that "tropical flowers were too sweet; he liked the scent of apple orchards better than orange groves." Another time we sat on the veranda at evening; he complained of the sickening odor of the jessamines, and the next morning all the flower-scents was that of the garden pink. We had a whole border edged with them at home. I think he was homesick.

As the winter wore on we grew tired of Key West. It seemed too circumscribed and isolated either for health or development or happiness. Its great cocoa-nuts, majestic palms, and hundred-leaved aloes ceased to interest when Robert grew no better. Occasionally the many eulogiums on the climate the atmosphere was too dreamy for an invalid, began to take of change. We spoke of Cuba; Robert did not like the idea of Havana. We spoke much of New Orleans; but it was too near spring to render New Orleans a desirable place of residence. Besides, the secession troubles were waxing warmer and warmer every day, and were likely to render the social atmosphere of a large Southern city uncongenial to strangers who sought only for health and repose.

We were debating the subject one morning when Doctor M'I——— called. "Where shall we go next, Doctor, since we have resolved to leave the Island?" Robert asked.

"I have been thinking about it since you mentioned the subject the other day," he replied, "and have made up my mind what I would do in your place. I would go to Tampa Bay. There is a thriving little settlement there around Fort Brooklyn, with the best climate in the world for both summer and winter. It is entirely unscathed from east winds, and refreshed by perpetual breezes from the Gulf. Brooklyn down in Florida! I was ordered there on duty during the Florida war, and after a year's residence came away renovated and ready for work. I think of the North another summer, but go there and stay until you are benefited."

Political troubles were suggested.

"Even if they should become more serious," the Doctor replied, "I don't think they would be likely to affect you there much, as it is a place of no political importance. Communications with the Island from the North are infrequent, and I don't apprehend any interruption at present."

We conversed for some time upon the advantages of the Tampa settlement, the last which we had before heard very little, and were pleased with the Doctor's recommendation and suggestions.

A week later the steamer Magnolia, which for some time had been coasting northward, turned its prow to the east, and was soon making headway among the keys which stand guard on the outer boundary of Tampa Bay. The dark-blue waters were a shade more lightly tinged as the vessel sped onward, leaving an island here and an island there echoed a regional verdure.

Passing the light-house it came to anchor at last, with the few shores of the main land on either side. The main land was before us also, though still too far away to be distinctly visible. We were to cross from this little steamer which formed the interchain of communication with the Hillsboro. The passengers all clustered on the upper deck of the Magnolia to watch the craft which had been duly signaled, and whose smoke was floating like gray vapor in the distance.

How every thing thing becomes an interest to the traveler at sea! Men who in the busy street would scarcely turn their heads for an armada, only a few hours from terra firma will be seen with anxious eagerness straining their eyes, or directing their glasses, toward any object, however insignificant, which chances to greet their vision. Such real interest did the little boat from Tampa awaken in a hundred minds on the Montoya-Bird, and a third the Cracker. A gentleman called the Mosquito, or Rattlesnake; and so we had names ad infinitum.

Meanwhile the little steamer, puffing porpoise-like, advanced until we could read, plainly lettered on her sides, The Scottish Chief. Three cheers for The Scottish Chief were called for, and responded to with a will, and a moment after reaching cheers came back from the gallant little boat. A number of gentlemen were standing on the guards when she came along-side; and that was the last observation until the plank was crossed: then Robert and I moved forward on the deck of the strange vessel waving adieus to our companions on the receding steamer. We were quite alone, going by ourselves to a land of strangers; but with my brother no spot on earth seemed lonely. Not an island of the seas, however remote or isolated, I would not have neared with joy had it promised health and strength to my host I said.

Robert looked pale and weary when the excitement of the change was over, and we were about to go below for rest, when a gentleman approached us with a stool in each hand.

"Allow me to offer you the best the boat affords," he said, with marked ease of manner. "The accommodations here are very poor indeed."

My brother accepted the seat, and thanked the stranger for his courtesy. I preferred standing; and while the gentleman still remained in conversation strayed away a little distance, watching every feature of the beautiful bay and its evergreen shores. After two or three days of sail, rounding another point, and passing another island, lo! the city, namesake of the bay, lay just before us, with Fort Brooke on the left, bonneries and deserted. Magnificent trees overshadowed the low wooden cottages, and the lofty old garrison. Century-old live-oaks—the remains of the primitive forest—draped with the pale, graceful Alhandia (or Spanish moss), diminished the stranger with their size and beauty. Giant mulberries, blossoming oranges, and limetrees with their fragrance far and near, seemed to mark the effect on my brother, who had risen and stood leaning over the guards.

"Lovely! is it not, Margy?" he said, in answer to my silent inquiry.

"Charming! I've nothing wanting but our glorious old flag. The citizens of Tampa should keep it waving, for picturesqueness if not for patriotism."

A frown gathered suddenly on the brow of the stranger, whose features I now scanned for the first time. They were fine enough in point of mobility, bold enough for manhood, and handsome enough to captivate any mere lover of beauty. So I said anyone at first glance; but, on looking, moreover, that the frown increased rather than diminished at the effect of the whole.

Robert made no reply to my remark; but the gentleman, addressing his words to him, said, "Florida has now a new banner to wave, brother, for weal or for woe!" then touching his hat slightly, went forward and disappeared.

"Who can he be?" I said, when the steamer lay at the old Government wharf. The few passengers who had accompanied her merely for pleasure were already ashore. There was a crowd collected around the landing, eager for news, but no sign of a stranger. The Lieutenant of the Florida House, the most eligible stopping-place in town, was not distant; but if disinclined to walk through the heavy sand, he could send one of the boat-hands for a vehicle for us.

We thanked him, and sat down quietly to wait. The Captain soon made his appearance again, and said that Colonel Hamilton, one of the gentlemen who had just left the boat, had sent his carriage and servant to convey us to the hotel. Who Colonel Hamilton might be we knew not; but a boy in the servant-garb declared himself, and said he came for the sick gentleman and the lady, Robert no longer hesitated. Wading through the heavy sand, the boat was soon reached the hotel. The same gentleman who had proffered attentions on the boat stood amidst a group of men on the piazza, and came forward to receive us.

"Only a hotel keeper on the look-out for customers," was the first suspicion, which his words speedily contradicted.

He greeted my brother with the warmth of a friend, and said, "Our host being absent to-day, and the servants here very slow, I took the liberty to send my own carriage for you, landing at the door. I hope you are not very much fatigued."

Robert took the hand so cordially extended, and thanked the stranger with an air of depression which told how sincerely he appreciated his kindness.

Pleasant apartments were speedily provided for us, notwithstanding the Supreme Court was in session, and judges, lawyers, and officials of various sections of the State thronged the hotel. How it occurred that two of the finest rooms in the house should have been overlooked at first did not transpire, although we congratulated ourselves much on the good fortune. I did not care so much for myself; I could have endured any inconvenience with the end in view. But for Robert—heavily as he battled with bodily encumbrances, courageously as he confronted disease—my heart overflowed with gratitude for him whenever he could be spared the slightest pang or comfort. That he would ultimately recover I had fully believed from the moment we left the chilling breezes of the North, and set our faces toward the sunny South.

The days passed very pleasantly at Tampa. Nothing could be finer than the atmosphere, which in midwinter seemed a luxury to breathe. The change promised to be no less beneficial than agreeable, and Robert grew more cheerful continually. Our host and hostess did every thing for the pleasure as well as accommodation of their guests. To my brother their attentions were unremitting. Here, as every where else, he became a special favorite; and rides, drives, sails, and fishing excursions down the bay were constantly proposed for his amusement and benefit. Every morning Colonel Hamilton's light carriage was at the door for a drive into the pine woods which surrounded the town. The Colonel always accompanied him on these excursions, for which reason I never went, though often politely assured that the vacant seat remained a standing invitation. I did not like the man. He was too popular altogether. For Robert, I was readily tolerated me on my brother's account, therefore took every occasion to thank me for it. I felt sorry at times that Robert should like him so much; but his attentions to him from the first, delicate aid discriminating, were exactly of a character to win his regard.

The Colonel was a lawyer from the interior, or rather immense farm. He was single, and a widower. As soon as the Court adjourned he would of course go away. On my own account I would not be sorry, as we were natural acquaintances. I would only regret my brother's loss.

Haunting political excitement waxed warmer and stronger. One by one the Cotton States had followed in the South Carolina wake of secession, just as a simple flock will follow the lead of one unruly sheep. Every mail brought news of agitation along the border, and of inundations of the tide of war from the North and South. The Star of Peace grew dim and dimmer, while Mars, fiery and red, cast its sickening rays over the whole heavens, from horizon to horizon.

While hope for our beloved country was dying daily in our hearts, Robert was growing stronger and better. His cough abated, and his spirits grew buoyant and cheerful. It was evident he had left consumption behind on the coast at last. Should we risk another change, or the chances of war on the enemy's soil? I was effectually resolving the question in my own mind before Robert mentioned the subject.

"Margy," he said at length, "the crisis is at hand. Shall we remain here, or go to the side of the war, or go home?"

"There, my thousand times!" I replied, unhesitatingly, "unless as it is. No one would injure you, Robert."

"I am glad to think of myself, Margy, but if you, in case any thing should happen to—"

He did not finish the sentence, but turned away with a quivering lip. I knew what was in his mind, and, putting my arms around his neck, said, resolutely,

"Nothing is going to happen to you, Robert. The climate is curing you, as I knew it would from the first. Doctor Kane wrote you not to return North on my account, and I would endure rebellion forever rather than risk a hair of your head. I am not a fanatic on whatever our principles here, or sanction treason by word or deed; and I never will. I would die first!"

The gentleman smiled, and the brother's fine nerve was to provide funds which would be available in any contingency, as bills of exchange were impossible at the present time. The first draft from Key West came soon; another from New York would make us independent if worse should come.

Like a thunder-clap broke upon us one week April and listening ear to replies, cool and candid, it is true, but savoring strongly of the rank spleen which for thirty years the South had been fostering, of which laughing, as I was in danger of a relapse; when, turning my head suddenly, a sight was revealed which made me start to my feet. Standing from the shelter of a tree was a human figure, ghastly and horrible. The sunken eyes, the terrible discovery brought both gentlemen to their feet in an instant. Robert lifted me from the saddle and supported me in his arms, while Colonel Hamilton went to observe more closely. The giddiness or faintness passed away soon, leaving a dull, sickening pain impossible to describe.

"Let us go," I urged. "Oh, Robert, you are ill! How pale you are!"

He made no reply. Hamilton came up at the moment. He observed the change which had fallen on my brother's countenance, and said, kindly,

"This is too much for you, my dear fellow! You should have remained in care of your sister to me. You shall do so now."

"I need no further care," I said, starting up suddenly, "if Robert is recovered. But, Sir, will you not aid my brother?"

I was much alarmed, and spoke with an earnestness which surprised me instantly.

Robert sat leaning his head upon his hand in an attitude of exhaustion, while the Colonel bent over him, speaking in an undertone, which I could not understand. I saw him take something from his pocket, and put it in his hand, put one hand to his own pocket-knife in return.

"Are you ill?" I said, with a faint suspicion of the truth. "Oh, my poor brother!"

"I shall be better in a minute, Margy," he said, faintly; "I was not much alarmed."

Colonel Hamilton, who was now tenderly supporting Robert, said to me, "I think your brother unable to ride back to the town on horseback. Would you be afraid to go by yourself and order the carriage here immediately? The distance is not great, and you have only to give your horse the rein; he will take you directly to the hotel."

"I think I can manage," I replied, when Robert interposed; "I believe I shall be able to ride soon."

"I can allow you to run no risks. Miss Miller, I would not ask you to leave your brother and perform this service if the spot were not too lonely for you to remain here. One of us must go."

"Let it be me, then," I said, resolutely. "I am ready."

"I rode one of the Major's horses," he continued, "and, fortunately, mine will be fresh. He will find the Key-to-the-Swamp Branch; he knows the spot. I think your brother will be better soon."

He spoke with a warmth of interest which made me forget for the time how much I disliked him, and I suffered him to aid me into the saddle again.

Swift as the wind flew my good steed, out of the pine woods, through the shrub-oak and palmetto barrens, on to the town. Not a moment was lost, and my arrival at the hotel in such wild haste and alone drew every gentleman on the piazza to the street in an instant.

"Major Thomson, please order Colonel Hamilton's carriage in a moment. My brother is very ill."

It was all I could say before bursting into tears.

Whatever the political errors of the South, no one shall say she has not hearts generous and tender, easily touched to sympathy with sorrow.

A dozen men were outstretched to assist me from my horse; voices only a minute since stern and bitter in their denunciations of my loved New England were demanding now in soft-spoken tones the nature of my brother's attack, whether I had left him alone, and his distance from the city; all of which I answered as soon as I was able to control my emotion.

In anxiety for Robert I forgot to mention the horrid discovery we made in the pine woods, and not until the carriage was at the door, and the kind landlady with two or three other gentlemen were mounting to accompany it, did it occur to me. I then related the circumstance as briefly as possible.

"Judge Moody," said the Major to one of the gentlemen on the piazza, "it seems those cursed Regulators have been at work again. There's another man dangling from a pine-tree. I expect they found him tampering with the negroes of yesterday. Now, Tom"—addressing the driver—"away like the wind!"

It was soon said than done, for no carriage was ever able to make above a snail's speed on the roads of Southern Florida. Corduroy bridges are Macadamized in comparison with the jagged, ragged palmetto roots which at every step almost lie in wait, like embedded fangs, in the deep sand. Interminable seemed the path of return, lengthened by anxiety and impatience. The gentleman on horseback left us far behind, and when we reached the spot stood dismounted and waiting.

Robert was standing also, leaning on Colonel Hamilton's arm, very pale, still, though a sweet, gentle smile overspread his features.

"I reckon you your brother, Miss Miller, latter, as I promised," the Colonel said while assisting him to the carriage.

"Allow me to see him for it."

I could not speak to Robert; but folding one arm around him as he took the seat beside me, and clasping his hand in his hands, I felt like one who has recovered a lost treasure.

"Give me the lines, Tom, and you ride by Miller's horse and lead the latter. He'll need you here wait a while." With these orders Colonel Hamilton took the front seat, and drove very carefully over the rude paths which led to the more open road.

I regret exceedingly the fright you have had this afternoon, and its cause," he said, turning and addressing us when the way no longer demanded careful attention. "I shall be here in Florida a secret organization as singular as it is dangerous. A set of men ruling themselves Regulators believe the safety of our city exposed in them. Many of these are good men morally and socially, but monomaniacs on this subject. A friend of mine was hung, who would not scruple to commit any deed which has blackened the annals since the days of Cain. If a person arrested and tried by a legal tribunal is condemned, they often overthrow the sentence by setting him at liberty. If such a one is acquitted, and happen to fall under their ban, they try him in secret conclave by their own laws, and sentence him to death or execution, according to their opinion of his deserts. Several legal opinions have been set at naught by these means a few years ago, and the one in the present instance. Yesterday a man—a stranger in the country—was tried on suspicion of aiding the escape of runaways, and honorably acquitted. To-day he is hanging like a dog. It was whispered this morning that the prisoner was watching, and for the war-news I have no doubt a search would have been instituted; but in a community like this one thing speedily gives place to another.

"But why, may I ask, are not the victims of their diabolic acts arrested?"

"It is only a bravado of the collective mass, perfectly safe in uttering, 'Thus decree the Regulators!' while not an individual of them all would dare assert, 'I did the deed!'"

We arrived safely at the hotel, and for two or three days Robert remained feeble and languid, then began to mend again. Not until he had seek to consult me for his own comfort.

The spring comes, following one another in close succession, came at length to a final adjournment. The city had been full all this town comparatively lively ever since our arrival. Every day now left vacant seats at table, and it was apparent that the hotels would soon be left alone. Most of those would follow in time, and it was not certain that my brother and I would not be the only summer boarders.

For some time an excursion to one of the orange groves—or "Old Tampa," a section of country bordering on the outer bay, had been contemplated by the hotel company and a few of the citizens. It was a place of historic interest, being the first landing-point of De Soto's party; and the remains of his fortifications were said to be distinctly visible after a lapse of nearly three centuries. At the first mention of the excursion Robert and I had expressed a wish to be of the party; on account of his illness it had been postponed.

MAJOR-GENERAL WILLIAM TECUMSEH SHERMAN.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

GENERAL GEORGE H. THOMAS.

We give on our first page this week a portrait of General GEORGE H. THOMAS, who now leads the principal army of Sherman in the Western campaign. General THOMAS was born in Southampton County, Virginia, in July, 1816. He graduated at West Point in 1840. In the Regular army THOMAS, in 1861, held the position once occupied by General Lee, that of Colonel of the Fifth cavalry; but in 1863 he was promoted to a Brigadier-Generalship. After the battle of Mill Spring he commanded a corps in Buell's army. He retained command of this corps under ROSECRANS. At the battle of Chickamauga his skill and the courage of his command saved the day. In SHERMAN'S Georgia campaign General THOMAS commanded the army of the Cumberland, one of the three grand divisions under SHERMAN. General THOMAS'S career from the victory of Mill Spring down to the present time has been brilliant and successful, and we are sure that his conduct of the campaign against HOOD will confirm SHERMAN'S judgment in leaving to his hands the entire Western campaign.

TORPEDO RAFT OFF MOBILE.

THE sketch on page 804 shows the appearance of one of the torpedo rafts which the rebels have lodged in Mobile Bay to impede the progress of our fleet toward the city. A few vessels of the fleet are visible in the back-ground, while in front the sailors are engaged in the delicate and dangerous operation of removing the torpedoes from the raft. An unusually high sea does not by any means facilitate this process; the sailor straddling the torpedo and plying the wrench is alternately dipped under the mounting waves, and then again made visible for a brief interval to his anxious comrades, to whom as to himself a slight slip of the hand or a brush of the wrench against the side of the torpedo would certainly be the occasion of utter destruction. Each of the torpedoes represented weighed 440 pounds empty.

OUR FLEET IN HAMPTON ROADS.

On page 805 we give an illustration representing the Federal fleet gathered at Hampton Roads. Fortress Monroe has since the beginning of the war been the grand place of rendezvous for our fleet, and the starting-point of all the principal naval expeditions. Here the Burnside and Port Royal expeditions were assembled before they sailed away. Here the fleet gathered at this point is of especial interest in view of the naval operations which, during the next few months, will play an important part in the war. This fleet comprises a large number of vessels, each of whom has a history of her own. Some of them, like the Minnesota and Roanoke, were at the first picture of Port Royal; the Wabash was flag-ship on that occasion. The Powhatan, so long engaged in the exciting chase after the Sumter, the Florida, who caught the Chesapeake; the Colorado, who destroyed the privateer Judah; the Niagara, who helped fight the Merrimac; the New Ironsides, flagship in the grand naval attack on Fort Sumter in April, 1863, and who some near being destroyed by a torpedo a few months afterward; and the old ship Brooklyn, who gained for herself such distinction at the capture of New Orleans and in Mobile Bay last August.

We also give on the same page a sketch of Fort Wool, named after the old and able General who so long commanded the post of Fortress Monroe.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

RECKLESS DRIVING.—A cabman has lately driven his own mother out of her senses.

ENGLAND'S "MAIN DRAINAGE."—Taxation.

A HUMOROUS and beautiful young lady being asked by her mamma where she was going, said she was going to practice archery with an Irish beau and school.

PATRON OF THE SCAFFOLD.—There was a laird in the north of Scotland, who died some thirty or forty years ago, who had a great partiality for attending executions; and his local standing would appear to have made his presence at such times a matter of duty on him. On one occasion, unfortunate wretch was about to be "turned off;" the rope was adjusted, every thing was ready. The laird, as man, however, stood waiting with apparent anxiety, evidently for the arrival of some spectator. Judge, then, he did not proceed with the business, he replied, with a look of surprise at his questioner, "The laird is nae come yet!"

NEW WAY OF LEARNING LANGUAGES.—A well-known spiritual medium says that if one can see, you can, with his aid, at a point most remote from the shore, easily make out the language of a ship's crew.

AN anxious mother in Scotland, taking leave of her son on his departure for England, gave him this advice: "My dear Sandy, see that ye bring good company, and get all ye either ye can from the scriptures—look every thing ye can. But the English are queer knaves, tackle people, and cheat them, Sandy. Never fight a bald man, for ye canna catch him by the hair."

"JEM, what letter in the alphabet do you like best?" "Well, I don't like to say, Mr. Smithe." "Pooh, nonsense! tell me what letter do you like the best?" "Well," dropping her eyes, "I like U best."

AN OLD BACHELOR'S DEFINITION OF LOVE.—A little sighing, a little crying, a little dying, and a good deal of lying.

MR. LOWER, in his excellent work on "English Surnames," has a story of a man who fell into a pit somewhere in Wales, and whose cries for assistance were heard by a passing stranger. "Who are you?" inquired the traveler. "Jenkin ap Griffith ap Robin ap William ap Evan ap Ieuan," was the reply. "Why, what a lazy set you must be, to lie rolling in that hole, half a dozen of you! Why, in the name of common sense, don't you help one another out?" was the answer of the disgusted traveler as he rode away.

WHY does the new moon remind one of a giddy girl?—Because she's too young to show much reflection.

OH, HOW ARTFUL!

WIFE. "Whenever I want a nice snug day, all to myself, I tell George my mother is coming, and then I not nothing of him till one in the morning."

THERE is a story told of an imperial highness waiting thrice on the same evening with an English lady at the Court of Berlin. The lady, flattered by his attention, frankly expressed her gratification at the compliment. "I did not intend it as a compliment," was the answer. "Then," said the lady, "your highness must be very fond of dancing." "Not at all," was the unembarrassed response. "What, then, may I ask, can be your imperial highness's motive for so often visiting me?" was the excited personage's curt reply. "I dance to perspire."

It is a part of the Boston creed that one who is born in that city does not need to be born again.

A STERN REALITY.—The Man at the Wheel.

THE Rev. J. F. Gardiner, a missionary in Rupert's Land, gives the following word of eighteen syllables as an illustration of the peculiarities of the Indian language: "Kegyweehaeyhowkeeuneeneehoomeethinewup" ... "I will dine with you."

PROOF POSITIVE.—Old John B——, was a hypochondriac, and one of his favorite subjects was the state of his health. One day, as he was taking a seat, his wife, who was behind him, attempted to sit down gently, and he did heavily to the floor. "There!" cried she, triumphantly, "I told you you'd be the death of me some day, with your mode of glass than I am, else you would have been broken into a thousand pieces!"

AN Irishman was summoned for refusing to pay a doctor's bill, when he was asked why he refused to pay, "What for should I pay him?" he said; "he has failed to give me any thing but some emetics, and the niver a one could I keep on my stomich at all at all."

Judge Rooke in going the western circuit had a great stone thrown at his head; but from the circumstance of his stooping at the time, it passed over him. "You see," said he, "I been an upright judge I might have been killed."

"Father," said a little father, apparently reflecting intently on something, "I think I send you any of my wedding-cake when I get married." "Why, my boy, what was the fond father's inquiry. "Because," said the young philosopher, "they didn't send us any to you."

If a man is given to liquor, let not liquor be given to him.

DR. Dolobran was a stiff Tory and always drove splendid cattle. One day one of his tenants, who had been petitioning his team, asked the doctor not to think the less of his prayer if the horses ran away with him, as it was out of his opinion in regard to politics. "Most certainly not," replied the doctor, "for I am sure that you know much more about horses than about politics."

"Ned, who is the girl I saw you walking with?" "Miss Biggs." "Biggs! Biggs! well, she must be the one I'm going such a name." "So I think," rejoined Ned; "I picked her up much that I offered her mine, and she's going to take it."

"FIRE day for the race," said a wag to a sporting friend one bright morning in May. "It's entirely contradicted against this friend. "Why, the human race, to be sure," was the reply.

UNCLE LUTHER.

WE ran away together, Edward and I; and perhaps we were wrong to do it, but we loved each other very, very dearly, and I was to be left to bring a dear, good papa and mamma, for I only had an uncle, who had never been very kind to me since he became my guardian, and Edward, who was like a father; and, as he said, it seemed very hard that, because his father and my uncle were not friends, we were to be separated forever. My boy—I had a foolish habit of calling him my boy that I am not sure I shall ever be able to break myself of—had had been brought up to expect a large fortune, and taught no profession; while every one said that I should be an heiress, and as my uncle was very likely, for there was no one else who had the slightest claim to inherit upon him.

But when Uncle Luther entered Edward from the house he told me that if I ever spoke to him again I could not expect a penny from him; and as it seems that Edward's father said much the same thing when my boy confessed his love for me.

"Do we care for money, Edward?" I said, and you and I be separated for the love of gold? I have youth and strength, and I can win my own way to fortune with the best of them."

For my part, to be with him was enough, and so it told him.

One bright moonlight night he met me at the garden gate, and in an hour the wedding-ring was on my finger, and I had promised to love, honor, and obey my darling while I lived.

Edward was not quite penniless. He had a few hundreds left him by his mother, and with part of this: to travel to the Far West, where lands are cheap, and buy a farm there, and begin a wild, happy country life, pure at first, but thriving for a competence in old age. It seemed a pleasant plan, and I think it would have been successful, for the very day after we were married we started for the West. I remember my darling as he stepped into the cars, so tall and strong and manly, with his bold, free glances at him, and read in the eyes of other men that they knew how strong and beautiful he was; and I was very proud of him sitting beside me, so watchful of my comfort, so fond and proud of me.

The cars whirled on behind the smoking engine. People chatted, and ate lunches, and took naps, and I am sure that there was no thought of fear in the heart of any one there. A handsome bridal party many of them had been rattled and screamed away across the country, and often over even that very bridge which at present was trembling, and there was not such a thing as anxiety in any countenance I might believe in warnings and presentiments, but there was not. Of that I am quite sure, and always shall be.

For my part my mind had wandered to our Western farm to be, and with his arm about my waist, I sat quietly looking at the green fields and the blue water and the purple mountain-tops so far away, when a crash, a rumbling sound, a chorus of wild screams and cries, a horrible fall, and all was darkness and chaos. When I came to myself the blood was streaming from my temples, and I lay in the midst of broken fragments of wood and iron. My first thought was of Edward. Oh, my darling! I looked to the right and to the left. I could distinguish no one—only protracted groaning forms, and others wildly crying. Amidst the rubbish, or breaking those they found to an open spot on the grass beyond. A man stood near me. Perhaps he was looking for me, unharmed and well himself.

I called aloud, "Edward, Edward!" and a faint moan answered me. Even though I was, I soon and groped about, listening and peering, and soon—oh, great Heavens! I never shall forget that moment—found my husband under a barricade of joists and bars, I saw his face at the bottom, beyond my reach. I screamed his name again, and he answered, faintly,

"Thank God, you are safe!"

Then I asked, "Are you hurt much, Edward?"

"I think so. My head is not, and I can move my arms, but there is an awful weight upon me. Oh, my God! what will I do if you are killed?" in a poor woman here also—dead, I think. I can bear it if you are safe, only tell them to come soon."

Then I flew for assistance, and the next thing I knew I had clutched a stout old man by the arm, and was not praying but commanding him to take my husband out of that awful place. He scolded me. They were at work already; but, oh! what a long time it took to get away the heaped-up mass.

Body after body was spread on the grass before they took him up and carried him on a rude litter to the spot where my darling's arms were lying.

He was alive still. I thanked God for that. And I tried to be calm and help them. All the weight of those beams and boards had fallen on his lower limbs, but otherwise he was not greatly injured. They gave me a cordial to drink. After a while they told me that he might live, soon that he would. And so, at the little wayside tavern, I nursed him back to life, and prayed for him night and day. So that when the old surgeon—a good, fatherly man—took me into the garden one day, and, bidding me be calm, told me that I would never be quite strong again, and that he must be a cripple for life, I could listen with a few tears, and tell him that I had heard what he expected before.

But I prayed him to tell Edward, and not to leave him to tell me.

Well, we knew our fate, and we met in one long, tearful embrace. And he said, "My dearest, can you love a poor, helpless cripple, who would never have sought to win you had he known he should come to this?"

And I answered, "Oh, Edward, better than I ever did the strong man of whose good looks I used to be so proud!"

And he trusted me, and went to sleep with his poor head upon my arm; and I sat there all night, praying God to comfort him and bless us both.

By-and-by he got about on crutches. It was a glad and a sad day to both of us. And the color returned to his face, and the hair began to curl, curl dark and crisp again about his head. And at last the old rich tones came into the sweet voice. He was as well as he ever was. Of course the idea of that wild life on a Western farm was over. And our money was almost gone. Neither of us had any hope of inheritance, and we knew, young as we were, that we had a hard struggle before us.

Edward could think of but one thing. He had learned book-keeping at school, and he was fond of writing—perhaps by those means he could earn a living. And so, in my own heart, resolved that my needle should not be idle, though knowing how hard it would seem to my boy that his wife should work for money, I said nothing to him about it. We went back to New York—I was glad enough when the journey was over, for every sound startled me, and grief had rendered me timid—and, after at last engaged two rooms on a third floor, furnished them very plainly, and went to house-keeping. An old Scotchwoman, who had accompanied us ward to a certain Mr. Baxter, and so we were able in.

What I could do to make our little place a home I did with all my heart, and I found some fine work and worked at it when Edward came home. Indeed, it when I heard the first click of his crutches on the stairs. I had his slippers ready and his dressing-gown. And I was happy. A little cookery-book I had to contrive cheap luxuries for our table. One of the greatest trials that our poverty brought me was the living by rules to my husband's means, which he must tell over night and morning.

Sundays we went to church together in the morning, and in the afternoon I read to him or he to us, or we talked quite gayly sometimes, for real love will make people merry in spite of any thing.

One day we read in our newspaper the marriage of Edward's father to a young lady whom he knew well. And after that what little dreams I had of ultimate reconciliation between the two faded from my mind entirely.

It was a month from that time when—twas on a quiet Sunday eve, and we had been reading "Prue and I," that we delight in—I married lovers all the language—strange steps came up the stair, and, following them, a rap at the door. I lifted my head from my dear boy's shoulder and went to open it. And there stood without a bent old man in a ragged coat, leaning on his cane and peering at me with his great blue eyes—eyes that were very bright for so feeble an old creature.

"Does Edward Millbank live here?" he asked.

"Speak loud, for I'm very deaf."

And when I said and nodded "Yes," he came in. He was a very old man—so wrapped about about the throat in dingy shawls, so bent, and so white haired. My dear boy arose and stood with one hand on my shoulder, looking at him.

"You don't remember me, Edward?" said the old man.

"No," replied my dear, "and yet—"

"What's that he says?" asked the old man.

"No? Ah, I didn't expect it. You've forgotten the rides on old Ajax, and the fishing in the little brook, and the young man who carried you on his shoulder so often when you were a baby. You've forgotten your mother's brother Luke?"

"Uncle Luther!" cried my dearest boy, and his eyes glistened. He stretched out his hand, and the old man came forward and shook them. Then he said,

"Sit down, nephew, sit down. I heard of your railroad accident, but I didn't know—" There he stopped with a glance at the crutches, and went on in that loud key peculiar to the extremely deaf.

"You all thought I was making my fortune abroad, didn't you? Well, I've made it, and spent it, or lost it, or got rid of it somehow, you know. You don't need to be told that when you look at this coat. And I came home a week ago, recovering that I had a rich relation—your father, Ned—and went to him to see how he would welcome me. He had a fine young wife like a dollababy: and for welcome he told me there was a poor-house for vagabonds like me. I asked for news of my nephew, and was told that he'd been kicked out of doors for marrying to his liking. So I came here—got your direction from your employer—knew you were poor, but didn't know—" Again that glance at the crutches —that pause—and something glittering on his hand.

Despite his oddity, and his shabby clothes, and deafness, I began to like old Uncle Luther.

"You have married, Uncle," said my dear boy. "I should not have expected such a change in you."

"Have I any change, did you say?" queried the old man, with his hand at his ear. "Oh dear, no —not a dime! That's purty good for a poor man. Can you let me creep in here, or haven't you enough for yourselves?"

There seemed very little use in trying to speak to him, but Edward held out his hand and shook that of the old man again.

That seemed an answer. Uncle Luther nodded, took off his dilapidated hat, and drew closer to the little stove. We all three had our feast together, and at bedtime I contrived a sleeping-place for the old man, and did the best I could to make him welcome. But when his heavy breathing told that he slumbered I crept close to Edward and whispered,

"My dear boy, can you afford this—you, who said no for the sake of riches?"

But he answered: "Olive, my Uncle Luther was my mother's dearest brother; and while I have a home it shall be my mother's home, even if he has been so kind to me when I remember him a babe and toothless one."

And I kissed him and said no more.

I never knew until afterward how he denied himself every thing for my sake, and worked until that weary distance to save a miserable fivepence, my poor, dear boy! I worked harder too, and Uncle Luther sat and read, and thought he had my sewing to grow dearer every hour. He could not hear a word we said to each other, and was no restraint upon our conversation.

Winter was deepening, and with it came new expenses. Another pound of beef and fried bread told on our slender purse; and there were lights and coal. Sometimes my dear boy—the broke down, and reproached himself with having brought me to such things, blighting my life, he said—as though having him I had not my greatest treasure.

Those long winter evenings; and it is now my dear boy's head to do some copying for a young lawyer, the son of his employer; and this was the way Warren Baxter first began to come to see us. He was friendly to Edward and quite gallant to me, though I could see that he had in a certain sense of our humble home and its appointments. I never liked him; but I said to myself, "He is Edward's friend, and I will be friendly and foolish," and tried to banish my aversion.

At last Mr. Baxter began to drop in in the daytime, bringing work to copy, which seemed to should be engaged in the evening. And I first noticed that his visits were an impression on my mind that his glances were not quite such as I might return; that his compliments went beyond the bounds of husbandly politeness. But what could I do? He was so necessary to Edward that it would be no light matter to offend him.

One day, a very cold midwinter day, with a leaden sky which threatened rain, and a cold mist in the air, I sat close by the window at work, when Warren Baxter entered. He had a cold and catarrh in his hand, and was more than usually brisk and cheerful.

He pulled off his handsome fur gloves, warmed his fingers at the fire, and roared to Uncle Luther touching over my head.

"Cold day, Sir, cold day!"

"Don't hear what you say," said the old man, complainingly; "I'm getter deaf in this weather always."

"Very cold," said Mr. Baxter.

"Bad coals! I should think they were indeed," said the old man. "Half cinders, and twenty cents a pail at least."

"You're so interruption to any conversation any how," muttered Warren Baxter, with the most polite smile. Then drawing a chair close to me he began to trifle with my work.

"What beautiful stitching!" he said. "Only such fingers as yours could accomplish it. Are you work too hard. I'm afraid you'll spoil your eyes; and that would never do."

"My eyes are strong," I answered, coldly.

"The strong and beautiful are found together sometimes then," said Mr. Baxter.

I made no answer.

"You have the loveliest eyes in the world," said Mr. Baxter. "And, if you will let me, I'll look in the glass. It seems a pity that— Heigh-ho!"

I put my sewing by, and went to the other side of the room. He made some remark about a draught from the window and followed me. You were never meant to sew for a living and wear coarse cotton gowns," he said.

"If I am suited with my dresses no one else need be troubled on that score," said I.

"Ah, but are you?" You love beautiful things; you have been used to refinement. You like to look well, I am sure."

"I look well to my husband, Sir," I answered: "that suffices me."

"You must look beautiful to any one," said Mr. Baxter; "but that is not the life for you. My dear—"

"Sir!"

"Mr. Wat Dee Millbank, you can't object to that. A humdrum, hard-working day, few comforts, no comfort. Passings passed watching your husband scribble, when you might be the belle of any ballroom."

"I beg you to cease this conversation, Sir," I said; "I am happy in this humble life of mine. I will not ask you to cease."

It does," he said. "Come, let us be good friends. You are so cold—so chilling. It is all very well to keep this up before strangers, but I know that you can't be happy, with poor food, poor clothes, such lodging as this, and a husband to whom you must be a nurse, while many a handsome young fellow would give his eyes for you."

I started to my feet, and pointed to the door. "Your way lies there, Sir," I said. Should I repeat this to my husband—"

"He'd knock me down, I presume," said the rascal, with a sneer.

"Now, my dear little woman, no acting is necessary, none whatever. I'm a man of the world; that husband of yours would be none the worse for our being friends."

"Go!" I repeated, "and never enter these doors again."

"Are you in earnest?"

"I am. Go!"

"Do you know what harm I can do Edward Millbank if you offend me?" said the young lawyer. He even his living by me. I can at will increase his salary. A word from me would lose him his present situation. Reflect. Don't anger me. It would be very hard to make me angry with you, yet you might do it and rue it also."

All I could say to him was, "Begone!" and in a little while I was alone, with the door locked between us.

Then I paced to and fro, and did Uncle Luther looking at me inquisitively. Would the insolent wretch really revenge himself so wickedly? Had I harmed my poor dear? Yet I could do nothing else.

I seldom gave way to tears, but they would come now. I threw myself down on the floor, and, buried up in the corner like a frightened child, wept bitterly. Soon a hand touched me, and I saw Uncle Luther at my side.

"Don't cry, my child," he said. "The Lord will provide. The darkest hour is just before day. Whatever troubles you, take heart. As yet, you and I only—me, the Lord will have pity on you."

A few days after, I was startled to say, Warren Baxter came to our house again. I had been absent taking home my sewing and doing my humble marketing for the week.

Opening the door quickly I ran against him ready to come out. I could see that he was heartily ashamed of himself, for he looked down and studiously blushed. He muttered an almost inaudible "Good-day," and something about having left some papers for Edward to copy and went down stairs quickly.

On the table I found a note directed to my husband, and the usual roll of paper. At least he was not so bad as I believed he would be.

Edward came home early and in a happy mood. Poor fellow, he was very light-hearted naturally, and only twenty-four that very day—too young to be so overwhelmed by all his trials and misfortunes. He laughed and jested, told some odd stories of an old lady who called Warren Baxter father, in hopes of discovering the contents of a will he had made for her brother; praised me as the best cook in the world; and made love to me as though I were not his wife; but that he always did.

After supper, sitting over the fire, he said:

"Nelly, Warren Baxter lost a magnificent gold watch and chain to-day."

"The old gentleman?" said I.

"No, Wat Dee," he added thing. There had been something the matter with it, and he had taken it out to mend. I had it upon my desk, partly to show me its beauty and partly to examine the works. Just then there was a disturbance in the street—a fight between two porters. He went to the window to look out; old Mr. Baxter, the other clerk William, Warren, and myself.

"When I was over I went back to my desk, and the watch was not there; but as Warren Baxter had left the room I supposed he had taken it with him and gone to the office, which, you know, is but three doors off.

"Two hours after, however, he came running in in great haste, and came straight to my desk.

"'I took that for what watch, I hope,' he said, 'as I told him that I had not seen it, and no one had, it seemed.

"Wilson, the old gentleman, two porters, who had been in the room, and even a small crowd outside, all were questioned. It seems impossible to suspect any one, and the watch must be gone for good.

"It may have slipped into a drawer, or some box, or pile of papers.

"So I suggested," said Edward; "and we rummaged all the afternoon. Warren could scarcely have been more excited if his dearest friend had been lost or stolen. To me it was an unfathomable mystery."

I could not, do what I would, banish the terror which stole over me when I heard this story. Warren Baxter was a bad man: he hated me now, and my husband—oh, surely, surely, he had no power to harm him!

I prayed softly to myself, with my face hidden on my dear boy's shoulder, as we sat there before the fire.

At nine the church clock, close at hand, had just struck, and our little time-piece, a minute or so slower, echoed the notes with its silvery tongue. Some one knocked loudly at our door, and Edward's "Come in" was answered by the entrance of three persons: old Mr. Baxter, Warren, and a strange man buttoned up in a large over-coat.

My dearest looked surprised as they drew to welcome them, and I could see across the fire a new look come over the face of the stranger, a look of strange, half-smile about the mouth, which for the moment altered him completely.

Old Mr. Baxter stopped a tear from his lashes as he spoke, and putting a hand trembling with emotion on my dear boy's arm—

"Mr. Millbank, relations," he began; remember, that I am no party to this. I came to tell you so —that is all. I can not express my indignation or my shame that a son of mine should so insult one whom I consider a dear friend."

Edward looked from one to the other with a gleaming eye and compressed lips; and Warren advanced, brushing his glossy hat with his right kid glove.

"I know that Millbank will take no offense," he said. "I do this only in a spirit of justice. The porters and I have searched, and if I did not; and the watch is too valuable to be lost. I—ahem —the fact is, as a matter of form, a mere matter of form, as a matter of justice, I have requested—"

"Speak out, Warren," said Edward, quietly. "Merely a form, my dear boy—nobody suspects you; but I am familiar, and you are not, with forms."

My boy's eyes sparkled; his cheek flushed scarlet.

"This is an insult I never expected to bear," he said. "A gentleman is still a gentleman, however poor—you should have remembered that. You should know better, Warren."

He paused, and his cheek turned pale again. He sat down and covered his face with his hands.

"Oh, my God!" he said, "that I should be search this poor home of ours. Olive, love, be calm; it is the merest formality, not you—"

"I believe the dog would send a search-warrant into his own father's house," said old Mr. Baxter. "If I will answer for him, Edward, I will."

"Father, you are aware this is a mere form," said young Baxter. "We legal gentlemen are obliged to do these things."

The strange man who had entered with them fastened a shield to the breast of his coat as he spoke.

"Not much to search, I believe," said Warren, with a covert sneer—"only two rooms and a closet, I believe."

"Not far, indeed," said a voice from the fireside, so clear and low that it was scarcely louder than it came from the lips of Uncle Luther. "Officer, I'll tell you where to find the watch and chain."

"Never mind, Sir," said the officer. His drivel means nothing," said Warren; but he turned pale as he spoke. I saw that, and gathered hope from it.

"He is neither quite so childish nor quite so deaf as you imagine, Sir," said I. "Search for the watch and chain are hidden under the upper bed in yonder room."

"In the name of Heaven, what do you mean?" cried Edward. "Do you dare accuse me of—"

Under the bed in that room," continued Uncle Luther, in his old and feeble manner. "Mr. Warren Baxter placed them to-day with his own hands for safe-keeping."

"Driveling fool!" ejaculated the young lawyer; "do you hope to save exposure by such a subterfuge?"

Prove that my statement is true!" said Uncle Luther; and the policeman entered our little bedroom, and returned in a few minutes with Warren Baxter's watch and chain in his hand.

"I am sorry, very sorry, that this should be the end of our visit," said the young lawyer; but Uncle Luther interposed;

"Unluckily for you it is not the end," he said, "for you found on my bed a dirty, drunken, disreputable man to deal with, and never recognized Luther Standish in his disguise. Villain, do you know me again?"

Upon the floor as he spoke fell the wrappings handkerchief, false hair, and the gray-haired, rosy-cheeked wig, and a keen-eyed, gray-haired man stood before us.

Warren Baxter shuddered, and clung to the doorpost for support. I think he would have made an effort to escape, but that Uncle Luther set his back against the door.

"Yes, Luther Standish is your accuser," he said, "and I have heard you say that he has known what happened here and elsewhere. He also came back to ask an account of an unfaithful steward. I have answered for you, Warren. I have learnt the suits uttered to that sweet lady, that true and loving wife. I saw you steal in on your vile errand, and hide yourself in the room as yet by me unseen, polluted by your very touch. You have signed your own death-warrant. Officer, I command you in the name of the law to arrest yonder villain."

Then Uncle Luther turned to us. "My dear children," he said, "you have suffered much, but listen to my story. I have lived a lonely life and in far distant lands for many years. Growing rich and yearning for home and old friends, I returned at last. I dreaded being welcomed for my gold alone, and thought to test the hearts of those I hoped to meet.

I sought you in your humble home, and was received me. Then I came here. You took me in and comforted me; then I should have told my secret, but I had another motive for disguise: I wanted to watch yonder rascal. He was my man of business, and from certain sources I learned that he had proved unfaithful to his trust, embezzled sundry valuable documents, trusting in my long absence and seeming negligence for escape.

"His last act was to forge my name. I have proofs, villain, proofs you can not combat. And you can no more harm yonder gentleman than you can save your detestable and cowardly self. Edward, my dear father, even though I could not bear you, yet you never spoke one word that was not kind and generous.

"Olive, my dear—nay, never give way now, you who have been so brave through so many trials."

That was the last I heard. Then the room began to swim before me, and I could not see my darling's loving face, and struggling against oblivion for a moment, fainted quite away.

When I awoke I was lying on my dear boy and Uncle Luther were with me in the little room, and I heard them say that all was right, and Warren Baxter came after, so that I only know that Warren Baxter was punished, but not how; and my dear boy became Uncle Luther's heir.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

A STRANGE STORY.—A truly melodramatic anecdote is in circulation in Paris, which must be accepted without material vouchers as to its truth, inasmuch as being given to the world by those who are not ordinarily favorable. A Russian nobleman, extremely wealthy, and very reserved and melancholy, has appeared of late in the best circles, where he has been received on distinguished introductions. The Russian became remarkable for wearing a ring of colossal proportions, composed entirely of the finest opal. As this gentleman's society became daily more courted, the ring was also noticed as being worn on the left hand, on the middle finger, and the character of the ring or the cause of its being worn, and the reserve of the wearer equally quiet and unbroken, made him a most interesting individual. A lady, however, who was piqued to know more than others of the matter, at last succeeded in the requisite end, and said, "Monsieur, every one is very much struck with the singular character of your ring. Will you tell me why?" He should be delighted to know his origin." The Russian made a mystic sign with his hand, as though to invite her to hide to him, while he replied, "Madame, the ring is such a jewel, as you may imagine, that the curious gathered round while he continued: "This jet substance is the body of a toad, which I burnt at a stake in the Russia; this was Italian. I promised her that I would preserve it, and I have kept my word." Another report in my world, which had never been broken. I tote the body of my wife Germaine, during the most silent watches of the day promised to radiate it, by powerful dissolvents and by great compression, to the smallest size that could see to wear it as a souvenir. For eight days he labored almost constantly at my presence, and I saw the size remains gradually decrease and intensity till the residue was the compact mineral you see. Such is the ring which, my dear wife, who, as I promised, I will never quit day or night during my life."

FAMILY CONFESSION.—In the family the law of pleasing ought to extend from the highest to the lowest. You are bound to please your husband; and your children are bound to please each other; and you are bound to please your servants, if you expect them to please you. Common sense pleasant in the household, and nowhere else. I have known a man to be a very good fellow out of his own husbands. If you had seen them in their own home you would have thought them a most unhappy pair; but if you had seen them in the street, or in the counting-house, or any where else except their own home, you would have thought them almost demoniac. But the opposite is apt to be the case. Which is the reason why Christianity, among strangers, we hold ourselves with self-respect, and we behave as if we were ashamed of it. Now, the proper way to conceive," I have played a part long enough, and now I am going to be myself. I am a Christian. We are ugly, and stupid, and blunt, and disagreeable. We have been trying to be graceful, and polite, and agreeable to our friends, but we have the hardest things into velvet, and that make life pleasant. We expect to be disappointed in future; and in future it will be profitable—where it will bring silver and gold.

NATIONAL IDEAS OF PARADISE.—The Laplander believes Paradise to be situated in the interior of the stone or garden. The Mussulgoes imagines it among the islands of the rust Pacific. The Greenlander expected that there would be iron wounds, or wax drowned, went to a cool and delightful place, there to enjoy the society of the departed, who died in battle or captivity were welled to the palace of the sun, and led a life of endless delight. Even the abode of four more years in the splendid habitation, they imagine could be changed into a cheerful festival of reveling song; having at the same time liberty to ascend to heaven and descend to earth, to revisit friends, and indulge in dancing songs. The Tonquinese imagine the forest and the mountains to be the residence of the blessed, and those who exercise an influence over the affairs of mankind: and in their ideas of heaven, the joys of future happiness regard a delightful climate, and atmosphere surcharged with a three-quarter moon, and the most delicious food, as the summit of earthly felicity. Among the Arabs a tine country, with plenty of water, is the very highest object of their promised bliss. There is a tribe of America who believe that the souls of the just are conveyed to a pleasant valley, abounding with grapes and other delicious fruits. The Hindoos imagine the seat of the blessed to consist of the "island of the good and brave;" their hell, that of the "island of the wicked." The Druids, it is said, as we are informed by Ammianus Marcellus, believed that souls did not migrate to the regions of future happiness from places of sorrow, enjoying, at every succeeding change, a more perfect felicity.

THE vintage of Xeryz is one of the loveliest sights in all the world. The hand holds then the great feast of wherefore, all Europe and Asia are represented. The wealthy the men are gathering the sweet grapes and dropping the bunches to the women and children who place them in their hands and show them away in the white wooden tubs. All the while the music of the band beats the time of mirth, with its gray own patiently cheering the call, and the and then comes the great wine-press, which with its pretty nets on their foreheads have not suffered to banish; their complexions are the color of the ripe fruit around them at keeping the beautiful beasts, or climbs up and helps himself to some of the delicious fruit that hangs on the wagon. And round and beyond as on every side are other vine-clad hills, with their rows of walnut and olive trees, and further yet the grand mountains and the lovely lake—the emerald green, the purple, the golden, the russet, the tints of the garlands tilt, far away. Most Cents with its crown of vine-leaves, and the fine setting sun.

THE WRONG INSTRUMENT.—A native church had recently been erected, and some friends of the vicar made a fund subscription to purchase a harmonium, capable of playing a certain number of tunes, and presented the gift to the vicar. He was in fact, constructed on the same principle as the hurdy-gurdy organ, and by the turning of a handle regulated one. Then I came here. You took me in and comforted me; then I should have told my secret, but I had another motive for disguise: I wanted to watch yonder rascal. He was my man of business, and from certain sources I learned that he had proved unfaithful to his trust, embezzled sundry valuable documents, trusting in my long absence and seeming negligence for escape.

"His last act was to forge my name. I have proofs, villain, proofs you can not combat. And you can no more harm yonder gentleman than you the congregation inaccurately joined in with the lively notes, and rather drowned the new air selected for the occasion. The minister held up his hand as a signal to stop; but the former mistaking his meaning, only made the handle revolve with greater rapidity; he stamped with rage and impatience, but faster and faster went the instrument, till the congregation were almost breathless in their efforts to keep up with it. At length the minister took a seat with the vicar of the subject; he observed that the congregation expected nothing, and cease to the usual conclusion that there is no scandal where there is no discovery. He substituted to the vicar for one day, but had the mistake confined without delay. It is said that the congregation still sing those tunes with the lively instrument which is their devotions at the opening of the church.

RESURRECTION.—Almost incredible as it often there is some superstition connected with this convulsion. In Sonar Southern India, the snake and also the night shade. It is there tell us that when the "King of Serpents" carried Buonaea to Solomon Islands. Thence he returned to Ceylon, no bowled a salutation, which was taken up by the entertainment; and when the horrid god had run through the palace it was re-echoed by the whole city. In Europe the superstition is that St. George, when he had slain the dragon upon the means, because during a certain peculiarity the company are in a kind of total sympathy.

UNION FOR DISPLAY.—The world is crazy for show. There is not one person in a thousand who does fair best in the world. Every man and woman sold for more than they are worth, and to extract enjoyment as he goes along. There is but one thing to be done. That is the eye of eternity. There is no end to the spring, the mimicry, the false pride of the superficial arts. If anything more outrageous, we admit, to live up to one's enlightened convictions in the times. Come and endeavor to join in the general chase you are located out of reach; there is no room for you. You are not in the circle of gratuitous. You are not in the society within the means. It resides in its purpose necessarily exclusive. It can be ready for the right, provided for there is something fresh rare in such an example.

"TO MY MOTHER IN HEAVEN."—A lady residing in the Rue de Rivoli, Paris, a few second young days since had a visit she had made in the department of Finisters, bringing with her a very pretty orphan girl, Jeanne Pierrette, named Yvonne S——, whom she engaged as her waiting-maid. Yvonne was very fond of her new mistress, and the lady died. When the body had been prepared for the funeral, and only a short time left before the corpse was seen to go stealthily into the room, lift up the shroud, and press hastily upon the lips of the dead one a small brass ring which, at its express desire of the deceased had been left on the finger. On examination, the ring was discovered to be untouched, but a paper was seen attached with a bit of thread to the coffin-plate, which was found to be a letter addressed by the young orphan to her mother, who had been years ago, "To my Mother: "My good Mother,—I have to tell you that M. S—— has died, and that I am now without a home or friends. I beg you to make known to us in a dream, whether I should apply to any one to take care of you. I shall myself, in order to write you, of the opportunity of my departure, to be with you. Your loving child, who has resigned "To my Mother in Heaven." The person alluded to is a lady who was one of the tradesmen of the deceased lady, who, having been struck with the good conduct of the young girl, had taken her into the office of service.

AN amusing anecdote is related as having occurred just before the coronation of the English of King Leopold. He was in love—it may, indeed, be doubted that he was ever out of love—with a pretty girl, the daughter of a poor dancing to a beautiful canary belonging to the proprietors of a coffee-house, near Charing Cross. The lovely child for her notes lever should, at any price, procure it for her. The landlord, knowing that they were in the habit of being fined to part with her pet for any sum of money. The landlord, however, refused to bring the bird, or to endure to see her face again. Thus goaded, Mordaunt hit upon a very clever project. Assuming the disguise of a Welsh dancing, he found a canary closely resembling the superb songster which was so charmed his lady-love. It was a new canary, and could not chirrup a note. Listening to the coffee-house, he quickly ascertained to what hour it was his custom to breakfast, and he made for her bird. "Oh that he'll sell this canary, Sir?" "Sell it! no more than I'll sell my own child, mine our good King was compelled to have one of his own taken away from him."

A REGIMENT and soldier of the French gendarmery were recently returning from Castre to Cepreno. On arriving at a certain point they were met by a number of men, all of whom were the celebrated brigand chiefs Guerra and Chiavone. Instead of flying, they advanced boldly, mistaking the French for Political guards. To sit quietly upon their horses was impossible. Each man, on receipt of their arms, when two were arrested and bound, the third getting off with his horse. In a short time, all could be released, which were refused, and captors and captives continued their journey, arriving about dusk at the called Sarcatine, they were encountered by the band of brigands, who, on seeing the two brigands bound by the third man, who had fled. To Capasso's order to release the brigands at once, when a violent struggle ensued, in which one of the gens d'armes on the ground, and the other, on flying, was shot by a second brigand. Not content with that, the brigands pierced the bodies with their daggers, broke their guns, and then mutilated them in a most barbarous manner, cut off their ears, and mutilated them. Such is the report of one of the gendarmes upon the spot, and in Rome is credible when we call to mind the well-authenticated brutalities which the Italian brigands have been guilty of for years by the bribes of the Church, the defenders of Divine Right. The Church's military auxiliaries are now on the alert. A strong detachment was sent to the scene of action, and by the 15th of November had captured Chiavone and taken to Rome.

WONDERFUL MECHANICAL CONTRIVANCES.—In the year 1570 a blacksmith of London, named Mark Scaliot, made a gold chain, which he presented to Queen Elizabeth, and also, composed of eleven several pieces, and a pipe key, and a stem wrought and finished; but one piece of gold. He also made a chain of gold of forty-three links, to which was fastened a lock and key, all of the same piece of gold the neck of a flea, it drew the same with ease. The chain, key, and lock of gold, but one piece of gold. In 1799 a man exhibited in London two fleas, one drawing a kind of car, and the other a sort of chariot, with the harness as a wonderful invention called "The Pantheon; or, the Temple of Gods," and the work of several years and great expense. It consisted of five curious pictures, the painting and contrivance of which were extraordinary. Small figures, about one hundred in number, moved their heads, eyes, arms, and fingers, and were set before admirers the living creatures.

THE FIRST MANNER.—In the reign of James I. men and women were looking-glasses publicly—the men, as they rode or walked, combing the hair that fell over their ears or glorious, or on their bosoms, or sometimes (like the dress of our days) on their backs. Their beards, too, were then made of feathers, inserted into silver or ivory tubes. At least one person brought this art to bear, and a whole stone was placed behind the door, upon which he sharpened his beard to be entered. In 1564 a Dutchman, named William Boonen, brought the first coach into England, and it is said the sight of it put both horse and coachman to a stand. Before this, he is said to have first invented hats and bands made of straw.

DR. VON EISENBERG'S ÆSTHETICO-NEURALGICON.

So numerous are the "Schools" of Medicine, and so bitterly does each of them denounce the theory and practice of all the others, it is no wonder that many persons have come to the conclusion that there is no such thing as a Science of Medicine, and that all medical practice is mere guess-work, if not actual humbug. But this hasty conclusion is wholly erroneous. The existence of so many schools and theories shows that many men are busy gathering facts, making investigations, and trying to master their significance. The great error is that each school in theory believes the truth and science confined to the others, though in fact the practice of all the schools is gradually assimilating. There no able Allopathist now administers in any ordinary case the enormous doses which were once the rule; and no able Homœopathist adheres to the infinite dilution of Hahnemann.

So many able and earnest men are devoting themselves to medical investigation that it would be strange if new discoveries were not made. Among the most brilliant of these—we may indeed say the most brilliant of all—is that of Dr. VON EISENBERG in regard to the Æsthetic action of Medicines; we may properly call it the "Spiritualization," when the Latin Spiritus, vigour, comes our word "Spiritual," signifies primarily simply "the air."

This discovery of Dr. VON EISENBERG, like most other discoveries, is apparently so simple when once made, that the wonder seems to be that it was not made and practically applied long ago. The greatest single advance made in medical theory since the days of Hippocrates, is that of Hahnemann, that the potency of medicines depends not so much upon the quantity taken into the system as upon their minute subdivision, so that they may be brought into immediate contact with the affected organs. He indeed carried his theory to an absurd extent, diluting and rubbishing until there was only a drop of medicine to many hogsheads of water. Hahnemann and his followers, the Homœopathists, knew of no more efficient vehicle of dilution than water. They then fell just short of that which constitutes the starting-point of the brilliant discovery of VON EISENBERG, to whom it occurred that if the air could be practically applied to this purpose, the most minute subdivision could be attained without the excessive dilutions of the Homœopathists. Medicines could then be inhaled or breathed in, instead of being merely swallowed, and thus a class of organs be directly reached which had heretofore been inaccessible to the direct action of medicine.

Many of the most important and vital organs of the human frame can not be reached by medicine in a solid or even in a liquid form. Thus the lungs are shut up in a bony cage to which access can be had only through a fine wind-pipe, the opening of which is closed by a valve, called the "epiglottis," so sensitive and so delicately constructed that it will not allow the passage, except by rude force, of the most minute crumb or the smallest drop of liquid. Every person who has "swallowed the wrong way" the smallest substance, whether of liquid or solid, knows the feeling of strangulation thereby occasioned. A man can not, if he would, voluntarily swallow any liquid or solid into the lungs or the passage leading to them. Herein lies the true reason why Consumption has been so incurable.

The causes of diseases commonly known by the name of Consumption are essentially of two kinds. One consists of the formation of "tubercles," that is ulcers in the body of the lungs; the other of inflammation of the lungs or the passage leading to them. If we could reach these organs directly by medicinal application, there is no reason why ulcerations or inflammations of the lungs might not be cured as readily as those upon the hand or face. Now pills or draughts, when swallowed, do not go near the lungs; they pass down the "orifice" into the stomach. To take pills or potions with the hope of directly curing Consumption, is as absurd as to take them to cure a boil on the arm or an inflammation of the eyelid. Indirectly, of course, the proper pills and draughts are of aid in all of these affections, by benefiting the general tone of the system, and thus enabling it the more readily to throw off disease. But directly, we can not too often repeat, they are of no use, for the very sufficient reason that they do not touch the diseased organ. Medicines can only touch the lungs when administered, not in a solid or liquid, but in an earthern or "spiritualized" form.

These remarks apply equally to diseases of the passage leading from the nostrils to different parts of the head, such as the throat and ear. These diseases, though not so fatal as Consumption, are yet often dangerous, and always annoying. For persons are unexperienced, more or less, with the aurymanes of colds, catarrhs, and influenzas. These, smell, hearing, and sight are impaired and not infrequently destroyed temporarily, and sometimes permanently, by these diseases.

Such is a brief outline of some of the facts which led Dr. VON EISENBERG, acting in the spirit of the Bremen philosophy, to the discovery of the theory of the Æsthetic Inhalation, or Spiritualization, of Medicines. The next task to which he set himself was to find some means of making his discovery of practical use, by investing some mode of administering medicines in an ethereal form. The ordinary means were clearly unavailing. You can not administer air by a tea-spoon. After the labor of two years, and an outlay of $2000, he succeeded in perfecting the apparatus of which the accompanying illustration gives a view, and which we shall now attempt briefly to describe.

On entering Von Eisenberg's establishment from the visitor will observe what appears to be three distinct machines, or elegant forms of exquisitely finished workmanship. These are, however, but parts of one apparatus, the connection between them being made beneath the floor. First there is what appears to be the beam of a double engine, elegantly finished in silver, which, by pressure, produces an atmosphere entirely purified of all vicious or deleterious substances. This atmosphere is forced by the instrument into a large cylinder constructed under the floor of the basement, capable of receiving ten hundred and fifty pounds of condensed air. From this cylinder the purified atmosphere is made to pass into a second large cylinder or chamber previously impregnated with the medicated vapors. From this second chamber, by opening a valve, the air, now thoroughly medicated, is permitted to proceed to the operating-room, where it is received into a second piece of mechanism, which presents the appearance of a triumphal arch supported by two bilky silver columns, into which the prepared air passes, into a third chamber of pure silver, built between the columns and forming the crown of the arch, where it is again mixed with various medicinal preparations.

From this chamber the spiritualized medical vapor is passed, when required, through a second invisible channel, to what appears to be the third machine or apparatus—a beautiful and elaborate instrument, consisting of not less than twenty-four magnificent crystal glass vessels, each charged with a different medical preparation. The largest of these vessels is capable of containing two gallons; four, one gallon each; ten receivers, that hold each one pint; eight, one half pint each; and one vessel, holding a pint, arranged with a neck like a douche, and with the single object in view of restoring health to the eye; and another, similarly constructed, the end somewhat similar to the mouth-piece of an ear-trumpet, which is used for the sole purpose of acting energetically upon the entire nerve. Besides these twenty-four vessels, there are four others capable of holding one quart of fluid each, to which are attached very elegant velvet tubes, which are to be used as inhalers, as mentioned by arranged that the patient, once he places one of them to his lips, must inhale the medicament of the vessel to which the tube is attached. The peculiarity of these tubes rests in the fact that the sufferer is compelled, however unaccustomed to their use, to breathe in the medicine. He can not refuse to receive into his throat and lungs a portion of the scientific medicinal matter with which each vessel is charged. These machines have attached to them gauges or indicators, showing how much the patient consumes at each operation, thus graduating the accuracy down to it may be considered advisable to throw into the system, or externally on the eye or the ear.

It is, of course, understood that the vessels are charged with different and independent medicines—preparations not only for the eye and ear, but for the head, and nasal organs, the throat, the chest, and the lungs. Each is applied according to the nature of the disease and the progress of the patient toward complete restoration. It should be remembered that the leading object of the entire apparatus is to purify and spiritualize the medicines used, so that they can be profitably, directly, and energetically employed. This fact alone is worthy the consideration of the diseased.

There is yet another instrument connected with the apparatus, by which the Doctor has given the name HEMM-INHALATIONS (from the Greek μεσον, mesos, "square," and πνεῦμα, pneuma, "the air"). This instrument, also placed in the immediate neighborhood of the lungs, is the invention of Dr. VON EISENBERG. By it he is enabled to diagnose or examine the chest or lungs; and by it he arrives at an exact knowledge of the roundness of the respiratory organ.

As to the entire apparatus, we have no hesitation in saying that we regard it as a wonderful invention—one that, if it is not so costly, we have little doubt would be adopted by every hospital and medical college in the country. We are satisfied it would well repay, even if he had to pursue all the way from Europe, the scientific man to see and examine it. It is a marvel of mechanical complexity, and yet, when its machines are considered, of extreme simplicity and great beauty. That it will in every respect fulfill the expectations of the inventor, we have every reason to believe. It has been constructed with an accurate knowledge of its ultimate uses. One experienced in the specialities for which it is particularly intended as is the Doctor, and for which he has long felt the necessity in his practice, could make no failure. With it he will be enabled to surmount obstacles that were hitherto deemed to all but impossible to contend. He can now approach with certainty and diagnose thoroughly every disease that in the course of his extended practice he must attend or threaten, therefore, who are in any way afflicted with loss of sight or hearing, with catarrh, bronchitis, chest or lung disease, we earnestly suggest a visit to the consulting apartments of Dr. VON EISENBERG. There he will be speedily made to know the possibility of a cure in even complicated cases, and will be encouraged to proceed until he is discharged thoroughly renovated and cured.

It will have been observed that the apparatus above described is intended also to bring the ethereal medicines into direct action upon the nerves. The nervous system is the source of many diseases. All physicians admit this, and all profess at least to be able to apply a remedy. The Allopathic, Homœopathic, and Hydropathic, by prescribing opiates, anodynes, etc., may, and do, alleviate the pain arising from impaired or diseased nerves; but this does not restore the nerve, it is only temporary relief—a relief, too, to some one nerve at the expense of the entire system. The Æsthetico-Neuralgicon of Dr. VON EISENBERG not merely allays the irritation, but restores the nerve to its normal condition. The Doctor's theory is, that each nerve has a specific office, and has its own peculiar susceptibility. They, for example, the nerve of vision is insensible to touch; and, on the other hand, the nerve of touch is insensible to light, and so on through the whole system. The great excellence of this æsthetical instrument is, that it can be applied, not on gross-work principles, which are on principle at all, but that it can be applied with accuracy and certainty to any nerve or nerves that are weakened or impaired—to the different nerves of motion, or sensation, to the eye, the ear, or the tooth, or to paralysis.

To the complicated and beautiful apparatus Dr. VON EISENBERG has given the name of Æsthetico-Neuralgicon. It is derived from the following Greek words: ἀισθητικὸς (AISTHETIKOS), aesthetic, or Atmospherical; νεῦρον (NEURON), a nerve; ἄλγος (ALGOS), pain or disease, with the termination -κων (-KON), equivalent to the English termination -ic, meaning pertaining to. The meaning of the compound word, when fully expressed, is "An apparatus philosophically constructed for treating diseases of the nervous system." And this describes exactly the character and object of the apparatus. It is constructed on the strictest principles of the Bremen philosophy. No experiment has entered into its conception or execution. The end to be attained was discovered by the most rigid induction of facts; and the means were adapted to the end, by the most careful consideration of every part.

A few words may properly be added respecting Dr. VON EISENBERG, the inventor of the valuable apparatus, which can not fail to effect a revolution in some of the most important departments of the science and practice of the healing art. His early professional training was received at the most famous institutions on the continent of Europe. Knowing that the science of Medicine was of low rank, and that for any one men to be able to attain high skill, must lead to toiler great advances beyond his predecessors, in every department, he resolved to devote himself to the special investigation and treatment of diseases of the Head, Throat, and Lungs, with especial reference to affections of the Eye and Ear. Deep enthusiasm for his profession, joined to natural talents for investigation, and unwearied industry, soon placed him in the front rank of his profession in Europe, a position which was awarded to him in the United States immediately upon his taking up his residence among us. This eminence will be more than confirmed by his recent invention.

CAPTAIN HALL'S ARCTIC RESEARCHES AND LIFE AMONG THE ESQUIMAUX: Arctic Researches and Life among the Esquimaux: being the Narrative of an Expedition in Search of Sir John Franklin, in the Years 1860, 1861, and 1862. By Charles Francis Hall. With Maps and 100 Illustrations, beautifully engraved from Drawings of Eskimo Faces, by Henry L. Stephens, Sol. Eytinge, W. S. L. Jewett, and Granville Perkins—Eskimo Scenes, Weapons, and Photographs. 8vo, Cloth, $4 50; Half Morocco, $6 00.

A narrative of extraordinary individual enterprise and perseverance, of adventure, travel, and exile, of a long intercourse with the Innuits, and full description of their manners, habits, and modes of life, and of the discovery of actual relics of the expedition of Martin Frobisher of three centuries ago, and of numerous traces of the recent discovering some of the survivors of Sir John Franklin's party. The volume is a record which the author, Hall, has just started, reinforced, on a second expedition. Although Hall's former visit has been so productive, it is the first case of the records of travel and adventure for which the Arctic regions have been so prolific.

QUEENS OF SONG: being Memoirs of some of the most celebrated Female Vocalists who have performed on the Lyric Stage from the Earliest Days of Opera to the Present Time. To which is added a Chronological List of all the Operas that have been performed, with Remarks. By Ellen Creathorne Clayton. With Portraits of Mrs. Billington, Madame Pasta, Madame Sontag, Madame Garcia Malibran, Madame Grisi, Jenny Lind, Clara Novello, Madame Vicedot Garcia, Madame Mariette Alboni, Madame Lind Goldschmidt, and Madame Marietta Piccolomini. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00; Half Morocco, $4 00.

"Miss Clayton's diligence has been great and her reading extensive, and of the materials which she has collected, or which have been at her command, she has made a very good use. She appears also to be possessed of considerable knowledge of music; her critical opinions are well expressed; and with respect to the composition of her own unpublished operas she is very modest."—Musical Examiner.

CONSTITUTION
LIFE SYRUP,
COMPOSED OF
IODIDE POTASSIUM,
WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID
EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.
PREPARED BY
WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,
Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician to Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup
HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigation of the liberal-minded and scientific to come which have so parallel as the present day.

During the past five years we have been extended with attaches, and overcome opposition, as herculean as were ever encountered by any medicine.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their genuineness. We think that diseases can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

This is our reply: In health the body fluids are a well-balanced scale, is in a state of Equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effects of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURITY OR THIN STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) DISEASES transmitted from PARENT TO CHILD.

PARALYTICS.

It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

INDIGESTION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, HEADACHE, BILIOUSNESS.

SCROFULA.

SYPHILIS, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, ULCERATION, SALT RHEUM.

This table (NECESSITATES AND ACQUIRES), filling life with untold misery, is, by the above medical remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

[ARTHRITIS], LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, TIC DOULOUREAUX.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a sovereign, it is in Rheumatism and its kindred affections. The most intense pains are almost instantly alleviated—enormous swellings are reduced. Cases, chronic for a score of years, of twenty or thirty years' standing, are born cured by us.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, removing the Bad Breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the SKIN,

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

and other difformities of this kind, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, thus making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever proved its equal.

Mild Pustules, on the female face, depending upon a diseased action of the Liver, are very successfully cured by young men and ladies.

Two Bottles of CONVERTIBLE LIFE SYRUP will correct the corrupted state of the blood, which is always the cause of disease.

Diseases of the Liver, giving rise to Languor, Dizziness, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an increased or contagious condition of that organ, accompanied with burning or other unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD

Produces healthy men and women; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, premature old age and death is the result. Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR DECEMBER, 1864.

Important to Subscribers.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY will please notice the date on the wrapper or Statement of Account. The figures on the direction-label following the name show the Number with which the Subscription EXPIRES, as noted on our books. Every Subscriber may thus ascertain whether he has received the proper credit for his remittance, and also when to renew his Subscription, so that no numbers may be lost. Subscribers are particularly requested to name the NUMBER with which their Subscriptions commence in all letters relating to the business of the establishment, as in many cases orders are received without any indication of the proper time. It is desirable that a Subscription should be renewed BEFORE the expiration of the former Subscription, in order that our books may be kept properly adjusted. Attention to these particulars obviates all the errors which annoy both Publishers and Subscribers.

ROYAL VICTORIA HOTEL.

This Hotel, situated at NASSAU, NEW PROVIDENCE, BAHAMAS, was built by the Colonial Government, and is a handsome three-story building, erected on an elevation a few minutes' walk from the shore, and commanding a fine view of the ocean, harbor, and town of Nassau.
Surrounding the Hotel is a piazza ten feet wide, from which the tourist can at all times enjoy the gentle, cooling, orderly trade-winds. INVALIDS unable to have much fatigue will have a promenade extending one thousand feet, without leaving the building. All of the TROPICAL FRUITS grow in great abundance, and are in season the entire year.
Visitors can take from the month of October to the first of June. THIS IS CONSIDERED THE PECULIAR SEASON FOR INVALIDS, though they can reside the entire year with comfort and safety. The roads are macadamized, and kept in good order. A most BEAUTIFUL DRIVE extends for twelve miles along the sea shore. In fact, every thing combines to make it a pleasant home for the robust as well as for the invalid.
The Lessee of the Hotel has recently secured the services of Mr. James Cassell, late of the "NEW YORK HOTEL," who will have the entire superintendence, and is determined to do all in his power to minister to the wants and comforts of his patrons.
The CULINARY and other departments shall be well supplied, the table shall be first class, and the servants attentive and assiduous.
The CUNARD CO.'S STEAM-SHIP CORSICA leaves the wharf of Jersey City and New York once a month for Nassau. The fare to Nassau is forty-five dollars. The passage for Round-Trip Tickets ($80 gold) will be.
Carriages and horses for rides may be hired at reasonable rates.

BARBARISM.

WRITTEN AFTER READING THE REPORT OF THE COMMISSION OF INQUIRY APPOINTED BY THE UNITED STATES SANITARY COMMISSION, 1864.

O scrupulous record! most pathetic page
That fills the blood-stained volume of our years!
Love, how itself is fired with holy rage
By scenes that bathe a Nation's heart in tears.

Reading, what veiled vicious fill my eyes
Of loathsome privies crammed with starving men,
And baleful swamps, where, 'neath the open skies,
The brave, like beasts, are herded in their pen!

I see their crouching forms, their vacant stare,
The hopeless look of eyes that can see not weep,
The wan, plucked faces, that were once so fair,
Of lovers gnawing their foul rags in sleep.

I see their bony fingers spread in vain
For one sweet morsel—spread in vain to take
The dear bon bitter—or to still relish
The trinkets sacred for love's tender sake.

I hear the keeper's oath—the idiot yell,
Breathing the hyper-oaths of a colonist woe—
The brutal retch that broken hearts avail,
The murderous shot that lays the captive low.

There, veiled in clothes through the misty night,
To child or mother from the cold they strive,
Or pacing fetid chambers prey for light,
Or prone on blistering sands creep all alive.

These are thy fruits, O thou barbaric curse!
This Slavery is the crown that decks thy brow:
This is the blood-stain which thou dost wear
There the fiend deeds thy charities allow!

O dark the hour that saw thy shameful birth,
And dark and blighting all thy guilty reign!
Rouse, freemen! smite the monster from the earth,
And on the nation God shall smile again.

SHERMAN.

HOW often, as the alarm of SHERMAN'S march rang into some unprepared town in Georgia which had before only heard the war afar off, it must have bitterly recalled to the mind of some thoughtful Georgian the prophecy of ALEXANDER STEPHENS four years ago. He foretold ravage and desolation. He pictured the woes of war which his mad neighbors were about beginning. He tried to show them that war was unnecessary for their own purpose—and that, once begun, it would be hopeless for that purpose. Others in the same State predicted the same result. "It will be a long and cruel war to save slavery," said one of the largest slaveholders in Georgia, "and it will end in universal emancipation."

And now at last, after four years, the prophecy is fulfilled where it was uttered. It is fulfilled by the General who said a year ago in Atlanta that "war is cruelty, and you can not refine it;" and therefore they who have brought war upon the country will be cursed forever. Every man in the State who can bear arms has been frantically summoned to the field. The cast of the Government has been hurriedly removed. The prisons have been emptied into the militia. Towns and villages are burned. Fields are wasted. There was a wild cry of universal confusion and alarm, and the whole State yet quivers with the terrible tread of SHERMAN and his men; and as the appalled, thoughtful Georgian listens and sees, it is impossible that he should not ask himself whether it were worth while to begin a war whose pretense was puerile, whose object was revolting, and whose consequences are utterly ruinous.

The Government of the United States, after a profound doubt whether any considerable body of citizens actually meant to bring upon the country every dire extremity of civil war—after a natural delay in employing every military resource to crush the rebellion, whose easy employment implied such bloodshed and desolation—after exhausting every hope that the rebels would listen to the dictates of common sense and a conciliatory policy, has been taught that swift war is the surest mercy, and putting its armies and navies in the hands of the most devoted and skillful soldiers and sailors, now wages destructive war, that by the flaming sword the authority of the people may be maintained, and the ferocity of rebels subdued.

Of that tremendous and inflexible purpose the late election was the evidence, and General SHERMAN's march through Georgia the first signal illustration. It has vindicated the truth of General GRANT's conviction that the rebellion was a shell—strong only upon the edges; that behind the two rebel armies there is no substantial, self-defending population, and that the rebellious section can be victoriously penetrated from end to end by a resolute leader and a true and tried army of loyal men. It is in vain that the rebel papers and orators assert that every overrunning their territory. It is in vain that they declare SHERMAN's movement is a retreat, and that he might as well have fallen back to Tennessee as have marched forward to the coast. The moral triumph of a movement which reveals the fact that every available rebel is in the army of LEE or HOOD, or that the home population is so indifferent to home defense that the folons must be turned loose and armed, is incalculable.

It is true that while the armies remain the rebellion survives. It is true that if ATLANTA and Vicksburg, if Richmond and Wilmington, are occupied by us, and the armies that defend them escape, we must advance to the next point at which they make a stand. You may take Richmond, says DAVIS, as you have taken New Orleans and Memphis, but you have not conquered us. True; but those events mark the rapidity with which we are conquering. Even the war waged by the rebels upon the Government must inevitably acknowledge the laws of war. It may be simply and bravely fought, the determination may be desperate, the conversion of society into a camp may be complete, but all wars waged with an object which the civilized world both sides end in one way, and one only, and that is the triumph of the side which is strongest in men and in resources.

It is folly for the rebels to say that they will never be conquered, and will never yield. Their rage does not make them more than men. Sullen hate, indeed, is not easily distinguished any where. We do not expect it to be in the rebel section. The chiefs will always hate the Government, and be always ready to employ against it. But that is the oldest fact in history. We shall "possess and occupy" the insurgent region; and when the passionate hearts, as they are not now permitted to know, that the people of this country mean nothing ungenerous or unfair, but that they do mean, as they will have proved, to the utmost of their power in this reunion, then the same human nature which, being deceived, has led the rebels so steadily and so long to wage a wicked war, will, being undeceived, gradually assent to a righteous and prosperous peace.

ULTIMUS ROMANORUM.

MR. CHARLES O'CONOR is reported to have said, at the meeting of the bar upon occasion of the death of Chief Justice TANEY, that he hoped the historian would not have to record that magistrate as ultimus Romanorum—the last of the Romans. It is natural that Mr. O'CONOR should indulge such an apprehension. His speech at the Academy of Music about a year or six years ago, and his remarks made, if we remember correctly, at the office of Mr. RICHARD LATHAM upon the very eve of the election, followed that Mr. O'CONOR was of those, to whom also JUDGE TANEY belonged, who were willing to make any sacrifice whatever to the faction which has menaced the country in war.

As for JUDGE TANEY, Mr. O'CONOR is aware that, in view of the history of his appointment to his high office, and of the aid which he lent the faction in the South which is now fulfilling its menace, he has been very leniently treated since his death. Historic justice has its own acts and words rather than the eulogies of any admirer. But if she does record, as Mr. O'CONOR fears and every true-hearted man hopes, that he was the ultimus of such Romanorum, History will never make a more gratifying record.

ON A LATE MESSAGE.

IF any man would know how the character of this country has been ennobled during the year, let him compare the Message of President LINCOLN with that of President BUCHANAN in December, 1860. A century of civilization seems to have elapsed between them. For the latter document two astounding doctrines were set forth: one that the Government of the United States had no power to defend itself from destruction; the other, that constitutional resistance to the manifest designs of the Southern leaders was virtually reasonable! The depth of national degradation was revealed in the last Message of President BUCHANAN. The height of true national glory is foretold in the present Message of President LINCOLN. Between the two templates a return of the faith of the nation to the principles on which it was founded. Neither Mr. BUCHANAN nor his Cabinet, nor his chiefs, had the dimmest conception of the character or significance of the American Government. They hated it heartily, and they were ready to destroy it the moment they lost control of it. Their conduct has opened the eyes of the people as nothing else could have done. We now perceive the necessity and value of a form of our fundamental principles; and at the same time the real spirit and intention of the men who directed the Government five years ago are plainly revealed.

Contrast this calm, simple, concise statement of public affairs—this firm, manly expression of the noblest national aspiration for equal justice with BUCHANAN's feeble whine for submission to the slave power, or with JEFFERSON DAVIS or JEFFERSON DAVIS at Macon, or his elaborately false representations in his messages in favor of a war upon the mildest Government, in order to perpetuate Slavery, and the real character American state paper should and what it should not be.

The prospects of peace as set forth by the President are exactly what every faithful citizen supposed them to be. When the men who began this war upon the Government lay down their arms, and yield to the Constitution and the laws and acts in accordance with it, the war will cease. It can not cease, except in the overthrow of the Government. Those whom four years have not taught this truth will never learn it. Those who think that the authority of the Government should be maintained by incessantly requesting rebels to mention the conditions upon which they will be pleased to obey the laws belong to the rebels in heart, and have been utterly repudiated by the people. In common with the rebels, they think the Message very "unconciliatory."

But its tranquil tone of faith in the people, and in the cause of the people attacked by slaveholders; its respectful and dignified bearing toward all other powers; its plain and pleasing statement of the steady increase of population and of the national resources; its assurance in heart-felt congratulation upon the release of Maryland from the deadly spell of Slavery; its truthful and encouraging representation of the progress of the war; its direct and conclusive dealing with the proposal of "negotiations," and the lofty confidence in a peace and union immediately founded upon justice which breathes all through it, make the Message, which is now familiar to the country, one of the sincerest, most noble, most honorable, and most truly American papers in our political history.

"CHIVALRY."

BRITISH Toryism and slaveholding chivalry have a profound sympathy not only in the fatal fact of their hatred of liberty, but in the love, in the choice of epithets and arguments to prove their own propriety to the rest of mankind. The Richmond Examiner, speaking last winter of the Yankees, cheerfully and chivalrously remarks: "One would suppose that creatures abounding in the stenches of moral decomposition would never be alluded to in decent society. But somehow the habit of expectorating upon the vermin that swarm the Northern mind has become a matter of gentle nature, and the time drags heavily on the Southerner who refuses to indulge himself some twenty times a day in a volley of direful anathema against the Yankee.....So the tiger that laps blood and the beetle that gorges excrement are both Yankees of Northern kingdoms. It follows that our feeling toward the people of the North, the scarabei and vipers of humanity, should be characterized neither by rage or nausea.....The emotions of passion are out of place when one is merely scalding chinches [bed-bugs]."

Now if this freedom of gentle natures from rage, and this elegance of phrase which, as you see, delicately breathes "chinches" for a more vulgar word, do not prove that people who suffer their prisoners to rot and starve are "chivalric;" if they do not show that men who steal negroes and sell them are "gentlemen;" that who wipe peasant women and sell their children, are "gentlemen;" and if they do not establish beyond peril that such chivalric gentlemen have a perfect right to govern the Government of their country at their pleasure, we are really afraid that these things are not susceptible of proof.

In the same "chivalric" spirit, evidently characterized as the preceding extract is, "neither by rage or nausea," the sympathetic Tory journal, the London Herald, a chief organ of the "English gentleman," calls the President of the United States "a vulgar, brutal boor, wholly destitute of political science, of military affairs, of every thing else which a statesman should know.....a vacillating, helpless imbecile."

Considering that the American slave-drivers and the British Tories claim to be peculiarly and exclusively gentlemen, the word gentleman is in extreme danger of falling into bad odor. Even the London correspondent perhaps may, that the wretched chinches who "gorge excrement"—that is, who work for our living and do not sell their children—have nothing about it. O fie, low-scrabbel and co-vipers! let us restrain our useless rage and nausea, and be scaled in silence by these "gentle natures."

MR. WEBB'S LETTER.

IF we are to apologize to Brazil for the capture of the Florida, we ought also to apologize for the apology that has been made by our minister, Mr. WEBB. It is impossible not to feel, upon perusing the correspondence dispatch to the Brazilian Foreign Minister, that he hailed with enthusiasm the infrequent opportunity, and gladly harnessed himself to the heavy yoke into the deeps of diplomacy. Mr. WEBB is a gentleman of undoubted ability and experience, but he has evidently fallen into an unhandsome position by what he is pleased to call, at the end of several sheets of paper, "this hasty note!" That is the sole pleasantry in his dispatch, and the paragraph in which it is a part comprises all that he ought to have said. "In the perfect conviction that the Government of the United States will promptly do all that is consistent with its proper dignity and the honor and dignity of Brazil, the undersigned asks your Excellency to excuse," etc., etc., and renews the expression of his, etc., etc.

Such a note would have saved the honor of both countries, and secured Mr. WEBB's immortality as a diplomatist. But does he think it suits the dignity of his country to say in effect: "England has proved by many of the great powers, and you, a little and insignificant power, declared equal belligerence between us and our rebels. We protest, but we can't help ourselves," and as you, small and wretched as you are, have followed England to do a mean thing, we must apologize to you as we should be obliged to apologize in the same circumstances to England, reserving to ourselves the right of doing something about it when we are able."

We do not quarrel with Mr. WEBB's statement of the hostile conduct of England and France in the indecent haste to acknowledge the rebel belligerency. We do not complain that he says the United States do not wish to be such an international custom. We only regret that he says these things upon such an occasion and with such evident spite toward Brazil. If general remarks upon the subject must have been made, why not treat Brazil as an independent power, and declare firmly and courteously that the United States protest against Brazil's recognition of the rebels as naval belligerents, reminding the doubting up of the fact and the making wry faces at England? Why log in England merely to say that if it were not for her and the other powers Brazil would not hear us apologizing? Mr. WEBB speaks of "the great injustice of England, to which Brazil, also, as soon as possible gave her sanction and approval." Does not that sentence turn the edge of the apology? Surely it is not very dignified nor polite to represent this country as saying to the rest of the world, "Ah! you are decidedly villains. I have my hands full just now, but as soon as I get them free, then, you rascals, you'll catch it. Meanwhile I'm only your very humble servant." It seems to us that St. John and Machiavelli would equally smile at such a stance.

While our hands are full and the hostility of other nations expresses itself in many ways, let us be silent. If we must speak, let us in the freest, plainest, and calmest words protest. But whatever may be our just indignation, honor and dignity alike require that we should not fawn at the mouth, nor shout unseemly huzzas, nor brandish our clenched fists in futile wrath. A nation should not argue when its arguments have no guns behind the n. It can only show its enemies and its friends its equal terms. If the terms are unequal, then let us have silence and bows, if bows must be made, under protest.

It is not the ability, patriotism, truthfulness, or argumentative skill of Mr. WEBB's dispatch that are objectionable but its heat and indiscretion. A nation may be expected to offer an apology which is proffered him with a pair of tongs. "His Excellency Señor JOAM PAZEOS DIAS VIEIRA of the council of his majesty the Emperor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs," may possibly ask the author of "this hasty note" to be good enough to explain his explanation.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE & CO.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE and a party of British rebel sympathizers recently asked permission to send an agent to this country to comfort the rebel prisoners in our hands. Mr. ADAMS, to whom his lordship addressed himself, properly replied that if Lord WHARNCLIFFE and his friends wished to help rebels, the best service they could render would be to minister to their diseased minds, since their bodies were well cared for, and to show them the wickedness and folly of their assault upon their Government, which never harmed or sought to harm them. It was well and worthily said. If his lordship will pardon a Yankee expression—and surely an Christian a soul will be charitable!—we would suggest to him that no English rebel sympathizer, from Lord PALMERSTON and Mr. RUSSELL down to Lord WHARNCLIFFE or the Rev. Mr. PARKER of the peace petition, has been able to get up and go through in the morning to find Mr. ADAMS napping.

If Lord WHARNCLIFFE and his English friends, however, are really anxious to soothe the suffering, we have the honor to inform him that the Government of a power in friendly relations with the Great Britain is defending itself and the cause of equal civil liberty against a ferocious, rebellion begun for the purpose of ruining that friendly nation and perpetuating human slavery —objects which it would be as much Lord WHARNCLIFFE or any honorable Englishman to suppose that he favors. The rebels have in their power at Andersonville and elsewhere thousands of men, their loyal fellow-citizens, whom they starve and torture in a manner hitherto unpracticed among people calling themselves civilized, and utterly incredible. Lord WHARNCLIFFE and his friends may see in the following extract from a letter sent to England not only a full and harrowing description of the fearful sufferings inflicted upon these brave men for the crime of defending their country, but also copies of the photographs appended, which tell the ghastly tale as no words can tell it.

We shall be very happy to record that Lord WHARNCLIFFE and any considerable body of "the nobility and gentry" of Great Britain are so profoundly touched by this vast and cruel suffering of the faithful citizens of a friendly power, that they have held "Liverpool bazars" to raise money for their relief, and have sought through the resident minister of that power to send it to them. Meanwhile, Lord WHARNcutter & Company will not be surprised that their proposal to feed loaves to the hungry, and to help those who are humanely restrained from the effort to destroy this country, is seen to be exactly what it is, an attempt to encourage and perpetuate human slavery—another attempt of the English Deerhound to save the sinking British pirate Alabama. Why should Lord Wharncliffe take such extraordinary pains to teach Americans a deeper hostility to the British aristocracy?

A RAILROAD "ACCIDENT."

The Evening Post says that a gentleman who arrived last week in this city, a few days ago, from the West, reported "an accident" upon the road over which he had journeyed. "What was the nature of it?" asked a friend. "Why we got through on time, and without a break-down," was the reply, 'and that is the only occurrence on a railroad, in these days, which ought to be called an accident."

Of course as our paper is issued but once a week we are not long able to keep pace with this record of railroad disasters. Among the most recent may be mentioned that upon the New Jersey Central Railroad. Two freight trains ran into each other a few days ago, although the Western Express came along and smashed into the wreck, destroying the locomotive. "No person was seriously hurt," it is said, "a few necks were broken outright, but how many nervous shocks entirely ruining the sufferers will date from your unreflectingly unnecessary and criminal event nobody can say.

"No person was seriously hurt"—but no thanks to the Company. Their duty was to run freight trains was out of time—or they both were. That was the culpable fault of the engineer. Then no flag of warning was sent out toward the approaching express train, or if so, it was disregar'.d, which was the criminal neglect of the engineer of that train. Such incidents, as the Post says, are not "accidents." They are no more accidents than the burning of a barn which has been carefully fired. There is simply a question whatever for carelessness, and a Company which does not make the strictest investigation of the circumstances, and publicly and vigorously dismiss the offending agents, trifles with the public safety.

LITERARY.

We find in the Paris letter of Mr. Childs's Publishers' Circular, a valuable monthly manual of literature of current merits we have not seen mentioned, the following characteristic anecdote of Alexandre Dumas:

M. Alex. Dumas has amused the town this week by a characteristic letter. The town of Cavaillon, in the department of Vaucluse, in Provence throughout France for its musk-melons. All the markets on the Rhone and Saone, and, indeed, itself, draw their supplies of the best canteloups from this southern city. The inhabitants of the town are justly proud of possessing so valuable a public library. They applied to eminent persons to aid them, those with donations in money, those with gifts of rare works. They applied, among others, to M. Alex. Dumas, who returned this answer: "Sir,—The treasury of the interior post letter I hastened to confer with my publisher, in order that it might send you the two or three hundred volumes of my works which have already appeared, and that he may send you the remainder as soon as I have finished. I am too happy to accede to the great honor you do me. But it was enough to say to M. Alex. Dumas, a boorish Mayor, that I give three books on one condition. If the town of Cavaillon has the honor of Cavaillon itself, like their melons very much, and I wish that, in exchange for my three or four hundred volumes, there may be sent, by municipal ordinance, a pension for life of twelve melons annually, the cost of carriage to be, of course, at my charge. Receive, etc. Alex. Dumas." M. Dumas, the well-known publisher, is in this week the delivering letter of the novelist, which will go far to exhaust the cause of his bankruptcy. A thousand encouragements to tell the story in M. Dumas's words: "We were dining at Mme. Doche's. Mme. Doche" residence is near the Champs Elysées. M. Alexandre Dumas—the eternal sponged-upon—had, as he always has, a great many guests. He told the story. "Well, Pierre, here are a great many Champagne-glasses, but I own to you, I have only twenty francs in my pocket. Some in the cellar. Then go buy some as the restaurant of the Frères Provençaux." The servant whispered to Dumas that there was inside each the words "No credit—no future," and that the cellar was empty. "Well, then, at the Café Anglais." "Sir, there are only two Dijon 300 bottles in the cellar." "No regret! Two seconds!" The servant: "I've not got one with me." Dumas: "Pierre!! you are a rogue! you are a thief! Be off with you!" Pierre went off at once, but before he went he told how Dumas called him back. "Come here, old Dumas. I have taken you out as a thief, but I have not got a good servant—you know, you rascal! that I can not get along without you. But when you do sell me a good servant, for the name of Heaven, give me credit!" M. Nadar asserts this anecdote to be literally true.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

The House resumed consideration of the bill to establish a mint on the east-ern part of New London. The bill was laid on the table by a vote of 89 to 85. The House then took up the Senate resolution reported during the last session by Mr. Illinois Ward, of New York, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, requesting the President to terminate the Reciprocity Treaty with Great Britain, and to give the requisite notice for the abrogation of the treaty, based on the true principles of reciprocity as existing the trade between the United States and the British North American provinces. The question pending from last session was on the passage of the resolution. The House now considered. A substitute was offered (Mr. Mercur, Pa.) which, while it declared the treaty should be made on reciprocal and satisfactory, providing for the adjustment of any matters of difference between the two Governments, and requesting the President to give the Government of Great Britain the notice required by the second article of the treaty of June 5, 1854, for the termination of the same. This substitute was rejected and the whole resolution, thus amended, was passed, 85 to 51.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN.

At recent advices General Sherman's army had crossed the Ogeechee River, and, passing Millen, had advanced to-ward Savannah. The city was then found plenty of provisions for his army, and had advanced with great deliberation. On the 13th inst. Gen. Foster, captured Fort Pemberton on the railroad from Charleston to Savannah, thus isolating the latter from the North. This will be a great help to the advance to Sherman, if the latter intends to attack Savannah. There is much excitement in the city and the people are divided, both by the Savannah, and on its right by the Ogeechee River. The Confederate forces are said to be concentrating in the rear. According to the latest Richmond news Sherman was only fifteen miles from Savannah.

GENERAL HOOD'S CAMPAIGN.

General Hood's army, after the battle of Franklin, retired northward in a partially broken condition. General Rousseau still holds Murfreesboro, On the 9th the main body of Hood's army was at Columbia, encamped on both sides of Duck River. The rest were at Spring Hill, across the river, 8 miles to the north. Forrest was at Lynnville, 12 miles to the north-east. After crossing the northern branch of Rutherford Creek he destroyed the bridge after him. To march the remaining 12 miles to Pulaski he would have to cross pushed up close to the enemy's works at Hatcher's Creek. General Cox's forces were at Mount Pleasant, Hatchford, and succeeded in destroying twenty miles of the railroad. The Confederates were less than 100.

On the 7th General D. U. Ledbetter captured the rebel position opened Decatur, Ala. This will open the river above to the canal from the rebel fire, which has hitherto been very annoying.

FOREIGN NEWS.

EUROPE.

The news of President Lincoln's re-election had reached Europe by the steamer Asia, and was almost unanimously hailed by English and French journals. No surprise was manifested at the result, but the London Times unquestionably mentioned the fact. The London Times regards it as a fortunate circumstance that the President is favorably disposed toward despotism; but thinks Mr. Lincoln not objectionable to foreign governments.

THE ITALIAN QUESTION.

The Franco-Italian Convention, by which it was determined that the French troops should be withdrawn from Rome, and the Italian capital be transferred from Turin to Florence, was signed on the 15th of September. The Convention consists of a preamble and 3 articles. In the preamble it is declared that the sovereignty of the Pope should be defended by the Catholic powers, but that it was necessary that the Pontifical States should be relieved from the obligation of maintaining a regular army disproportionate to their resources, and which was a heavy burden on the finances of the Holy See. The first article stipulates that the French troops shall be withdrawn from the Roman territory within two years, but that they may take the place of troops existing State Books; that Italy undertakes to prevent, further, any attack upon the territory of redressing all outstanding international differences. The second article stipulates that the French troops shall be withdrawn from the first day of each year, 3 6-60 per cent. per annum, with coupons attached, to the amount of the capital issued for their face, with the first added. A series of resolutions was introduced (Mr. Ashley, Ohio) for the restoration of peace to the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, and the Senate resolution (Mr. Ashley, Ohio) was adopted, and the Senate resolution (Mr. Ashley, Ohio) was adopted, and the Senate resolution (Mr. Ashley, Ohio) was adopted

CHIEF JUSTICES OF THE UNITED STATES.

JOHN JAY, the first Chief Justice of the United States, was born in New York, December 12, 1745. He graduated at Kings (now Columbia) College, in 1764, and was admitted to the bar four years later. When the Revolutionary troubles came on he took a prominent part in the contest. He was the youngest member of the first Congress, which convened in 1774. We can barely allude to his civil services during the Revolution. In 1777 he prepared the draft of the Constitution of the State of New York, and was appointed the first Chief Justice of the State. In 1779 he was sent on a mission to Spain. This Government demanded as a condition of recognizing the independence of the United States, that the possession of Florida and the exclusive right to navigate the Mississippi should be guaranteed to Spain. Jay refused to consent that the interests of our great river should be shut up by a foreign power. In conjunction with ADAMS, FRANKLIN, and LAURENS, MR. JAY negotiated the treaty by which Great Britain recognized the Independence of the United States. In 1784 he returned to his country, and was appointed Secretary for Foreign Affairs. When the Union took the place of the old Confederation, WASHINGTON requested him to select any office which he might prefer. He chose that of Chief Justice of the United States, to which he was appointed in 1789. In 1794 he was sent to Great Britain as ENVOY EXTRAORDINARY, to negotiate an important treaty. This treaty, which settled many questions in dispute between the two nations, was violently opposed by the Democratic party, especially at the South. He was absent a year and a half, while time he was elected Governor of New York. He then resigned the Chief Justiceship, was twice re-elected Governor, and, in March, 1801, in the fifty-six, resolved to retire from public life. President ADAMS, wishing to retain his services for the public, nominated him for his former place as Chief Justice, then vacated by the resignation of OLIVER ELLSWORTH, who declined, on the ground that he had deliberately made up his mind to retire from public life, and duty to his country did not then require him to decide. He retired to his farm in Bedford, New York, where he died May 17, 1829, in the eighty-fourth year of his age. While the question of the adoption of the Federal Constitution was before the people, HAMILTON, MADISON, and JAY projected the famous series of essays called the Federalist, of which the second, third, fourth, and fifth numbers, furnishing no more until the sixty-fourth number. During the greater part of the interval he was laying between life and death. A party of medical students had violated the grave to acquire subjects for dissection. They were put in prison; but a mob threatened their lives. JAY and others, under the lead of HAMILTON, joined to prevent the mob. They were not successful in the latters, and JAY was struck on the temple by a stone, and almost killed. He recovered only to be able to write the single additional paper, on a subject which he was especially requested to undertake. To this accident it is due that the Federalist is incomplete. It is, was not rendered still more valuable by contributions from one who was recognized as the ablest political writer in the United States. JAY was one of the noblest and purest characters in our history. Party-spirit ran higher in his day than ever it has in the most virulent period when attacks were made by party writers and speakers. WASHINGTON himself did not escape detraction; but no man, except a few violent partisans in South Carolina, however much he might oppose his public policy, dared to squeeze the perfect integrity of JOHN JAY.

Upon the resignation of MR. JAY, JOHN RUTLEDGE was appointed by the President Chief Justice of the United States. He was born in 1739, in South Carolina, whither his father had emigrated from Ireland four years before. He studied law in the Temple in London, and returned to Charleston in 1761, where he at once gained the highest rank at the bar. He espoused the cause of the colonies at the outset of the troubles with Great Britain. In 1776 he was appointed Major-General and Commander-in-Chief of the Colony of South Carolina. It was owing to him that Fort Moultrie was built, rendered so famous in the early struggle. General LEE, who commanded the Continental troops, pronounced the fort a "slaughter-pen," and ordered it to evacuate it. RUTLEDGE wrote to MOULTRIE, "General LEE wishes you to evacuate the fort; but you will not mind what comes from me. I would sooner cut off my hand than write one." When the Constitution of South Carolina was framed, RUTLEDGE refused the office, on the ground that it was too Democratic. He finally yielded his scruples, and was appointed Governor, with the title of Dictator. In 1791 he was appointed Associate Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, and in 1791 Chief Justice of South Carolina. In 1795 he was nominated by WASHINGTON Chief Justice of the United States. The treaty negotiated by JAY with Great Britain excited a storm of indignation in South Carolina. RUTLEDGE made a violent speech against it at Charleston, and two days before his appointment as Chief Justice reached him, in which he spoke in bitter language of the leaders of the then dominant Federal party, of which he had hitherto been considered a member. In August, 1795, he presided at a session of the Supreme Court, and in November started to hold a circuit in North Carolina, when he was attacked by sickness, and his mind was apparently affected. His wife, and the remembrance of his recent Charleston speech, induced the Senate to refuse to confirm his nomination—a refusal by no means disagreeable to the President, who was strongly in favor of JAY's treaty. Mortification at this rejection extinguished the last remnant of RUTLEDGE's sanity, and he died in 1800 at the age of sixty-one.

The President then nominated as Chief Justice Judge WILLIAM CUSHING of Massachusetts; the nomination was confirmed; but MR. CUSHING, after holding the commission a few days, resigned on account of ill-health. As he never acted in that capacity his name does not properly belong to the list of Chief Justices.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH was then nominated and confirmed as Chief Justice. He was born at Windsor, Connecticut, April 29, 1745. His studies commenced at Yale, were completed at Princeton, where he graduated at the age of twenty-three. For a time he was a teacher, then commenced the study of theology, but subsequently decided on the profession of law. He had then entered his twenty-first year, and gave him a farm of wild land and an axe. While slowly working his way at the bar he cleared his land for farm with his own hands. His early career gave no promise of future eminence; but the first upward steps once taken his progress was sure. He was appointed to the Council, and shortly was elected to the General Assembly. In 1777 he was chosen delegate to Congress, in 1784 Judge of the Superior Court of Connecticut, and in 1785 returned to Congress. In 1796 he was appointed Chief Justice of the United States. His unequivocal probity and the soundness of his judicial decisions gained him the highest respect.

In 1799 he was sent, against his wishes, as minister to France, though still retaining for two years his seat on the bench. His health failing he resigned his office in 1801, He died November 26, 1807, at the age of sixty-two.

JOHN MARSHALL, a direct descendant of our Chief Justice, was born in Fauquier County, Virginia, September 24, 1755. His father was a farmer in narrow circumstances, but decided ability. There were no schools in what was then the frontier region, and the early education of the future Chief Justice was commenced by his father, who for about a year by the clergyman of the parish, with whom he began to read Horace and Livy. By his own unaided exertions he subsequently became a fair classical scholar, and was intimately acquainted with English literature. He had just begun the study of law when the War of Independence broke out. In 1775 he was appointed lieutenant in a company of minute men. In the afterward joined Continental army, and was present at the battles of Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth. He continued his legal studies at intervals during the war, and at its close commenced practice. He soon rose to eminence at the bar and in politics. He was elected to a small but distinguished body of men through whose influence Virginia was induced to accept the Federal Constitution. In 1794 WASHINGTON offered him the post of Attorney-General, and subsequently the mission to France. Both offers were declined. The French Government having refused to receive MR. PINCKNEY as minister, MR. ADAMS, who was then President, appointed MR. MARSHALL as one of three envoys to that country. Shortly after his return he yielded to the personal solicitations of WASHINGTON, and consented to become a candidate for Congress. President ADAMS at the same time offered him a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court, which was declined. MR. MARSHALL went to Congress, after a sharp contest, taking his seat in December, 1799. There was excited session which followed he was one of the ablest supporters of the administration of MR. ADAMS. In May, 1800, he was nominated and confirmed Secretary of War, but he declined to accept the appointment. Shortly after he accepted the post of Secretary of State. On the 31st of January, 1801, he was nominated Chief Justice of the United States, a position which he held for thirty-five years, until his death in July, 1835, at the age of eighty years. His commanding character, sound judgment, and felicitous diction, added to the dignity and importance of the judicial seat, and the magnitude of the questions which came before him for decision, entitle MR. MARSHALL to stand all parallel with JAY and ELLSWORTH at the head of our Chief Justices. Besides his judicial labors he was the author of a History of the American Colonies, and of a Life of WASHINGTON, which we must still regard as the best yet written.

ROGER BROOKE TANEY was born in Calvert County, Maryland, March 17, 1777. He was the eldest JACKSON appointed him Attorney-General of the United States. Two years later MR. DUANE, then Secretary of the Treasury, refused to remove the Government deposits from the United States Bank, by which refusal he lost his office, and was appointed in his place. The Senate refused to confirm the nomination; but in the mean while MR. TANEY had made his way with MR. JACKSON by the removal of the deposits. JACKSON then nominated him as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, to fill a vacancy occasioned by the resignation of MR. DUVALL. The Senate refused to confirm the nomination. MR. DUVALL had left the bench in 1835, and JACKSON at once nominated MR. TANEY for the place. The Democrats having now a majority in the Senate appointed Governor, and in 1836 MR. TANEY became Chief Justice—a position which he retained until his death, October 12, 1864, a period of twenty-seven years. Chief Justice TANEY will be known by the famous "decision," or rather "opinion," in the Dred Scott case, in which, going beyond the question before the Court, he undertook to give a full and general question of the status of persons of African descent in the United States. The Constitutionality of Negro has been attached to him on account of a sentence in this opinion which apparently affirmed that blacks had no rights which whites were bound to respect. The context shows that this was the very reverse of the meaning intended to be conveyed by Judge TANEY. He says that it is now difficult to realize the state of opinion on this subject at the time of the formation of Government. Blacks were then regarded as beings of an inferior order, "and so far inferior that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect." This outrageous sentiment is mentioned only to be impliedly condemned. The "opinion" of the Chief Justice, harsh enough as he gave it, being to the effect that no person whose ancestors were imported to this country and sold as slaves was any right to sue in a court of the United States, or could become citizens of the United States. It is due to the honor of our highest judicial tribunal to state that the opinion of the Chief Justice did not affirm, but did by plain implication condemn, the doctrine that such persons "had no rights which whites were bound to respect." MR. TANEY's last notable public act was in May, 1861, when the case of John Merryman came before him. This man was arrested near Baltimore, on charge of being an officer in a company raised to aid the rebellion. He was imprisoned by the military authorities in Fort M'Henry. He prayed for a writ of habeas corpus, which was granted by Chief Justice TANEY. General CADWALADER, the commander, refused to obey, on the ground that the execution of the writ of habeas corpus had been suspended by the President in the State of Maryland. The Judge issued an order for the arrest of General CADWALADER. The Marshal was not allowed to serve the writ. The Judge then expressed openly an opinion, denying the right of the President to suspend the writ, and affirming that it was the duty of all military officers to obey it. He added that if the officer had been brought before him he should have punished him for contempt and imprisonment; but as he had no force capable of carrying his order into effect, he should report the whole case to the President, and call upon the Executive to perform the duty of the court. No further action was had on the case. MR. TANEY died October 12, 1864, at the age of eighty-seven, having filled the chief judicial chair of the country for the seventy-seven years. He owed his appointment to the two party-partisan services which he rendered to President JACKSON. As a jurist he can not be ranked with the great men who had occupied his seat before him. His political opinions have been impeached, even in the case of his unfortunate opinion in the Dred Scott case, or the later and more flagrant opinion in the Merryman case, given by which he will be chiefly remembered in after years.

SALMON PORTLAND CHASE, now Chief Justice of the United States, was born in Cornish, New Hampshire, January 13, 1808. His father having died, he was sent at the age of nine years to Ohio, and put under the care of his uncle, Bishop CHASE. After graduating for a time at Cincinnati College, he entered Dartmouth College in New Hampshire, from which he graduated in 1829. He went to Washington, where he opened a school, at the same time studying law under the direction of WILLIAM WIRT. Having been admitted to the bar, he went to Cincinnati, and commenced the practice of his profession. To this for some years he applied himself exclusively, taking no prominent part in politics. In 1830 he married the first Democratic party. In 1841 he first took a decided part in politics. He was then a member of a Democratic Convention of those opposed to the further extension of slavery, and was the author of the Address unanimously adopted by that body. He was subsequently elected to the Legislature, spent movements having this end in view, and was President of the Free Soil Democratic Convention held in Buffalo in 1848. The Democratic party in Ohio had at this time assumed the position of hostility to slavery in the Territories. MR. CHASE was chosen United States Senator in January, 1849, receiving the votes of all the Democratic members of the Legislature, together with those of others who were in favor of free soil. Though elected as a Democrat, he declared that if the party withdrew from its position on the slavery question he should withdraw with it. This he did formally in consequence of the action of the Democratic Convention held at Baltimore in 1852. The Republican party was then organized. MR. CHASE took the position of one of its acknowledged leaders. Soon after the close of his Senatorial term in 1855 he was elected Governor of Ohio. He was re-elected, his second term closing in 1860. In 1861 he was appointed Secretary of the Treasury, in that year he was next after MR. LINCOLN and MR. SEWARD the leading candidate for the Presidency. He had at one time been again brought forward to the Senate of the United States, and had he taken his place would undoubtedly have been the leader in that body. He resigned his seat in order to accept the position of Secretary of the Treasury—a position for which he was especially pointed out by the success of his financial policy while Governor of Ohio. It is honorable to all the persons that his name as a leading competitor of MR. LINCOLN for the Presidential nomination should have received and accepted his nomination as member of the Supreme Court. Presidential canvass of 1864 approached a strong effort was made to bring forward MR. CHASE as the Union candidate; but the general sense of the party was so unmistakably in favor of the re-election of MR. LINCOLN that MR. CHASE withdrew from the canvass, and gave his influential support to MR. LINCOLN. Meanwhile, finding that Congress hesitated to carry out the financial system which he had devised, MR. CHASE had on the 30th of June, 1864, resigned the post of Secretary of the Treasury. Almost the first important action of MR. LINCOLN after his re-election was to appoint MR. CHASE to the most important position within the executive nomination. The death of Chief Justice TANEY left the office of his high office at the age of fifty-six, with a sound legal reputation, and with a physique which gives reason to hope that he may be able to perform its duties for a period as long as that of his predecessor.

The Supreme Court of the United States consists of a Chief Justice, with a salary of $6500, and nine Associate Justices, with salaries of $6000. It holds one session annually at Washington, commencing on the first Monday of December. For judicial purposes the United States are divided into nine circuits, in each of which a Circuit Court is held twice a year for each State by one of the Justices of the Supreme Court and the District Judge of the State or District. The following is a list of the Justices of the Court, with the date of their several appointments:

Chief Justice.—SALMON P. CHASE, of Ohio, 1864.

Associate Justices.—JOHN CATRON, Tennessee, 1837. NATHAN CLIFFORD, Maine, 1858. DAVID DAVIS, Illinois, 1862. STEPHEN J. FIELD, California, 1863. NOAH H. SWAYNE, Ohio, 1862. SAMUEL F. MILLER, Iowa, 1862. SAMUEL NELSON, New York, 1845. NOAH H. SWAYNE, Ohio, 1862. JAMES M. WAYNE, Georgia, 1835.

CAPTURE OF PLYMOUTH, N.C.

WE engrave on page 820 four illustrations relating to the recent Capture of Plymouth, North Carolina. One of these gives a view on the Roanoke River, on which Plymouth is situated; the others relate to the battle which resulted in the capture of the city, and the appearance of the rebel ram Albemarle after the blowing off of her casemate.

On Monday morning, October 31, the fleet, under Commodore MACOMB, having succeeded in making the passage up Middle River into the Roanoke, nine miles above Plymouth, formed in line of battle and steamed down the river at 11 A.M., in the following order: Bull, Shawmut, Otsego, Wyalusing, Tacony, and tugs Martin and Stanley. The Bull is an old New York ferry-boat, and has been in several many fights, always doing good service. She was ahead, being able to fire two heavy guns directly ahead. The Shawmut rushed that all were right, and the fleet steamed on, the pilot picking his way among the obstructions. As it rounded a bend it encountered a battery of both guns half a mile distant. As each ship came within range a terrific broadside of grape and canister was delivered within their works, driving all from before it. There were batteries were then encountered and engaged, while the fleet got into smoother waters. Along the water front of the town were filled with sharp-shooters. The Bull seemed ready to lift into the air from the explosions and concussions of artillery. She slowed up, and the Shawmut dashed past, and as her steering gear was disabled she was severely cut up, and many dead and wounded covered her deck. Thus the fight went on till the rebel magazine was exploded, scattering death in all directions, and setting the town on fire in several places. From this moment the rebel fire slackened, and a party landing from the ships silenced the guns on the forts, raised the Stars and Stripes at 30 minutes past 12. The retreating rebels were pursued by shell from the Tacony and Wyalusing, inflicting great slaughter among them; and within an hour none remained except some fifty prisoners. The Shawmut was found sunk at the wharf. The captain had endeavored to destroy her as much as possible by exploding a torpedo in her magazine that had been placed under the boilers. Nothing. She now lies on the bottom, with only the upper part of her casemate out of water, and the top of that blown completely off.

GRANT'S MILITARY RAILROAD.

ON page 821 we engrave a series of sketches, giving a plan of GRANT'S Military Railroad from the point where it leaves James River to Patrick's Station on the left, with views of the several stations. The road follows in general the line of our intrenchments. The object of such lines is to render the rapid means of communication a military necessity. Since General GRANT first took a position in the rear of Petersburg, these lines, both offensive and defensive, have reached a high degree of elaboration. Besides this railroad there is a "gridiron" of ordinary roads running in every direction.

HOMES OF REBEL WOMEN.

THE interesting illustrations of the Homes of Rebel Women, drawn by our artist, MR. WATTS, and given on pages 824 and 825, may be relied on for their perfect accuracy, being drawn from life. When General FREMONT'S forces fought their way into Richmond houses on or near our picket line to remove families, sending them through the lines at Seven Pines, the artist accompanied him. We wonder if he never saw such destitution. The centre picture, the girl and baby in cradle, was one of the first we saw. Her husband and all her male relatives were in the Southern army, and she was alone, with nothing in the shape of food or drink in the house, sitting sadly, rocking her child beside the cold and empty fire-place.

In another house we found a woman with a number of little children, stooping over a wretched fire parching corn, the sole thing eatable in the house.

In another, two girls were rubbing corn on sheets of tin nailed to boards, a rude contrivance for manufacturing meal. In this house we found a man, but he was in bed, helpless with rheumatism. The middle sketch is from the outside of the hole named but, and is a fair representation of style of residence inhabited by these unfortunates.

The second sketch represents a woman aged, and nearly as helpless as the children who surrounded them. However, they were spinning and doing whatever household-work, with the loom, had formerly supported them. The room shows was their husband, who was absent serving in the rebel cause.

"The woman taking the oath of allegiance is one living within our lines, and being destitute, draws a ration from the Government Commissary. By a late order all persons living within our lines above the age of sixteen, male or female, must take the oath of allegiance to the United States or go through the lines.

The sketch of shell bursting in a house is an incident that occurred lately. In the house shown in the sketch of the fight near our rifle-pits a lady was sitting at the window, and two slightly, by the bursting of a shell, which also killed her dog; and her boy was wounded by a Minié ball. In all these cases we visited we found no males between fifteen and fifty."

GUERRILLA DEPREDATIONS.

THE two illustrations on page 829 refer us to scenes of frequent occurrence along the border line separating the Union and Rebel armies, and in the border States. The northern portion of Missouri is more infested with this scourge than any other section. There the citizens of the same State are arrayed against each other. The most daring guerrilla operations of this war have been performed by MOSBY in the east, and by MORGAN and his fellows in the west.

CHRISTMAS HYMN.

LONG time ago the dawn of day
Streamed through the low roof thatched and torn,
Where in the straw-clad manger lay
The Christ-child of the Virgin born.

The sun's glance touched the sleeping ass,
And chased away the gloom of night,
It flooded all those fruitful hills,
And smote Bethlehem's hall with light.

And in the East arose a star,
High over Judah on that morn,
The wise men saw it from afar,
And knew the great Messiah was born.

To-day with reverent hearts we keep
Sacred the memory of His birth
Who summoned from the grave's hushed sleep
Dead Lazarus back again to earth.

Who gave the multitude to eat—
At whose command the tempest ceased—
Whose feet walked upon the sparkling, rare and sweet,
Many anointed at the feast.

Through His atonement drew we nigh;
GREAT GOD OF BARTHS! unto Thee
We lift our fervent voices high,
Grasp Thou the sword of victory.

Let harsh oppression pass away,
And warm hearts sin from off the earth,
And ever sacred be the day
That gave the blessed Saviour birth.

Let black-winged pestilence disappear,
And war with all its horrors cease,
And may we in the tempest hear
The solemn voice of Christ say "Peace!"

SANTA CLAUS'S WISH COUNCIL.

IT was a blowy time with the generous old gentleman, for this was the night of his famous Wish Council; and the knotted brows of his Secretary, Blushes, and the piles of memoranda by which he was surrounded, testified to the amount of business on hand, while the air was full of the applejack, but to the unlucky visible forms of the wishes. Some were jolly and rosy in their intangibility, even giving signs of mortal etcetcry: some sweet and airy, like hair impalpable delicacy; others, hungry, eager, starvingly thrust these rosy vapors, and stretched forth bony fingers beseechingly to the genial Saint, to be stood smiling before his widemouthed, glowing fire-place. In the instant that the formal wish was gained from and minutes the supplication was carefully recorded by the nearly distracted Secretary, and it faded forever into nothingness. There were visions of fair children, with golden curls and rosy lips, begging, stocking in hand, for candy and toys; of spare and stout gentlemen with cravats, desirous of new editions of choice authors; of stylish dames who longed for pugnics, or Hoxton, or mantles, velvet, or glacé; young girls beseeching vapory evening dresses, and all manner of gold and gear; of ragged children praying for a mere glimpse of what Christmas joy, for a crumb from a rich man's table; of gaunt men in rugged uniforms begging for letters, for sympathy, for common food and clothing, for deliverance from prison, and vermin, and starvation; of other men not so gaunt and prison-worn, brave, hardy, and enduring, all turning loyally to the dear fireside for the light and warmth of the Christmas hearth which may not be denied them. And sadder sights than these were shadowy women, with begging rags, starving cheeks, and forgers pride and bleeding; asking for tea, blankets, food for the workers, medicines and care for the sick; thrusting out ill-spelled bills for unpaid work in sickness and; and fair, pale girls falling away over desks, over needle-work, and asking not to be forgotten by those who had been their guests in happier days, when their best friend filled a soldier's saddle and not a soldier's grave.

The wish had sway from the first gap of the Saint, and he walked anxiously up and down the room.

"Something must be done," said he, "different from what I have been done before. The days when the reindeer and I could manage this thing are over. One of Grant's wagon-trains could not carry the things I am expected to deliver. The days when a tiny stocking full of candy and nuts, a cake and a picture, or a wagon-load of toys and a jumping-jack would satisfy a child, appear to have passed away forever. Here's Fenella M'Fleuser wants a set-boat for her doll. Mrs. Katrina Van Trondlebehe wants a velvet cloak and royal ermines. Does she indeed! I've a great mind to bring her a catfish, and I have done it at times! And forty thousand others as reasonable as they. Fact is, I must quit it" and he threw the green-ice so warm that he threw off his mink dressing-gown, and kicked his slippers vigorously into one corner.

"Rachel Blushes, my buffalo-skin cloak, and see that the reindeer are ready in six seconds;" and the old gentleman flew round in a style quite astonishing in one of his age. "I'll see the parents themselves, and try to talk a little common sense into them. But what's this?"

Only three little—mother and daughters—for if you count the Topsy, who carried their white operacloaks over her arm. Mamma Dell in velvet and point-lace, a diamond pin confining the tiny collar. Daughter Clementine in white satin and bridal veil, red pouting full pouts, in her waxen cheeks. Sister Belinda as a bridesmaid in silk and blond.

"Your servant, ladies," bowed Santa Claus—and if he could have blushed at his ex-slavery he would have done so, had not nature anticipated any movement in that direction by tinging both cheeks and nose with the deepest carnation—"and what can I do for you?"

"We have a great favor to ask, Sir," replied Mamma Dell; "we are in grief, too, though that is not what we came to say to you. We were once a very happy family when Miss Katarina deigned us in mentine, and Clementine was engaged to the Zouave. But at the height of this gold went up, Katie's father made a fortune, and the poor Zouave was utterly demolished by the poker accidentally falling upon him as he lay on the rug in front of the fire. And Katie, instead of asking Uncle Sam to mend up our poor friend, took him up—oh, horrors! she threw him into the blazing grate. Imagine the feelings of a doll of sensibility at this awful moment! And all Katie would say was,

"'My papa is rich, but he can never mend one.'

"I crew of poor Clementine's attachment. I longed to fly to her, but you know we can not stir till bedtime of our own will. In the mean time Aunt Olive captured our prostrate forms, carried us off to her room, and arrayed us as you see, announcing that she was going to Demorest to Lord Dandbray, wherever he is, and that the wedding was to take place in the new Church-house on Christmas-eve. Meanwhile we lie hid in Aunt Olive's bureau drawer."

"Indeed," sobbed out poor Clementine, "I'd far rather marry the broken Zouave than this dreadful Dandbray, who is certain to be horrid, if I do have pearls and satin to wear"

"Yours is certainly a hard case," replied Santa Claus, who had listened attentively; "but I don't seem to be a case for my interference exactly."

"That is what I am coming to," said Mamma Dell. "Of course you are aware of where the poor Zouave from his ship grave; but while we were under Aunt Olive's care a poor woman came in (the window fastened, as you know) to carry off some shirts she had been making, and the drawer wasn't quite shut, and we couldn't help hearing what was said. She came to ask a shorter day for fire, and looked so hungrily at the children who were hanging on their mother's skirts and crying that Arthur left Katie to offer her some; but Katie said, 'she wanted all there was—there was none too much for her.'

"Then the children ran off to play, and Aunt Olive took us out and began to work on our dresses; and Mrs. Goodchild came back for the shirts and dollars, and blamed her for soiling them so much while making them. Then Mrs. Pettibone sighed, and looked at her dress (we could tell by the rustle, you know), and I heard her mutter,

"'All that money on those Frumpery dolls, and my Nellie dying at home without one comfort!'

"Now, when I heard her I was greatly grieved, and wished I could help her, but I can not, you know. Now, Sir, if you can help her, please do it, and do it quickly."

Blushes now announced the team, and Santa Claus, blowing his nose fiercely on his red bandana, offered seats to the dolls in his sleigh.

Hastily ascending the steps of iron for his night-ride, while Topsy wrapped her mistresses in their opera cloaks, the old gentleman hauled them in, jolted Topsy on good part, and mounted over her head all the way home. Tying his team to the lightning-rod, he helped the little brown-ye the flue of Olive's room, and, dropping another story, made his most unexpected appearance before Mrs. Goodchild's astonished face in drowsy ede as they dozed before the parlor grate.

"Servant, Sir," was the salutation of the Saint.

Now Mrs. Goodchild is a very worthy woman, as you may suppose, but a descendant of a Dutchman—the man whose hand always weighed a pound and his foot always kicked a beginning by hauling his skins which he was purchasing of some poor wretch of an Indian, and consequently Snyder was rich. Myndert and his wife looked very much astonished, as well they might; but they had been at Mrs. Lintcrwood's ball the night before, and were not too sleepy to do any thing but stare drowsily at the apparition before them, and Myndert stolidly removed his pipe to say in a deep voice,

Santa Claus brushed off the coal soot from his furs, threw back his capote, and wiped his face as he replied,

"I am St. Nicholas, at your service; and you are Mr. Myndert Goodchild, I believe."

Myndert nodded, in great amazement.

"My business is to talk to you concerning Christmas. I have a little commission to execute in favor of every body for the holiday season. Time was when I was equal to the demand; but it would take a stocking big enough for Gargantua, Pantagruel, and all that the children ask for, or a sugar-maple, if they have a Christmas-tree; and the wishes of the children abolish me entirely. Now, Sir, the children want gold and silver tea-sets for their dolls, and twelve courses of dinner, or a wagon-load of the grown-ups want every thing they ever heard of. Now, Sir, it's time to stop this nonsense. Children are just as happy with a bit of wax, a bit of knife and a handful of candy as with all this nonsense. And, if you do it to get talked of, you'd answer your purpose just as well by sending some to the soldiers, or the prisoners, or the Orphan Asylum, or the poor at your very door. There's the widow Goodchild, for instance, three children, a broken heart—the man of her was of fire and water, and the very

DINING—CORPULENCY—LEANNESS.

No. I.—ON DINING AND DINERS.

ANIMALS feed; man eats; the man of intellect alone knows how to eat. The Creator, in making it obligatory on man to eat to live, invites him thereto by appetite, and rewards him by the pleasures he experiences. Therefore good living is the act of our judgment, by which we give preference to things agreeable to taste to those which do not possess that quality. The pleasures of the table—for all ages, all conditions, all countries, and all seasons—they are the concomitants of all other pleasures, and with the rest are gone, they console us for our loss. In fact, the discovery of a new dish does more for the happiness of mankind than the discovery of a new planet. Men who eat healthily, or get drunk, do not know how to eat or drink. It is a common saying, "Tell me what you eat, and how you eat, and I will tell you what you are." The art of dining is quite distinct from the art of giving dinners; yet every one must admit that a gastronomy is a science well worthy the study of persons of intellect of both sexes; and it will lead them to the conclusion that a little more study in the selection of their dishes, in the management of their kitchen, and the attention to the comfort of their guests will enhance tenfold the pleasures of the table, and make their dinners select. It is said that a dinner without cheese is like a pretty woman with only one eye; so a man who invites friends to dinner and takes no personal interest in his dinner is not worthy of friendship.

If we are to credit ancient writers, their banquets were great festivals. Fish and game were brought to be head, though the demand made prices run high. Reclining on couches covered with purple, every art was brought into requisition to satisfy the guests. The good cheer was heightened by agreeable conversation, and dining became a science. After the third course singers were introduced, and conversation relaxed. Learned men devoted their pen to describe these enjoyments. Great writers traveled by land and by sea to discover where was most delicate for the table was produced. When Rome became the center of the riches of the world, the luxury of the table was carried to a degree almost incredible. From the locust to the ostrich, from the dormouse to the wild boar, every thing was tasted. Fishes was an especial object of luxury, and was brought from distant lands in pots of honey. But it was chiefly in the accessories of the repast that this gigantic luxury was carried to an extreme. All the furniture requisite for the banquet was of costly material and exquisite workmanship. The number of courses was gradually increased till it exceeded twenty, and after each course another set which had served for the previous course was removed, and fresh supplied. The most delicate perfumes enriched the banquet-hall. A single dinner at the end of the seventeenth century. Under their pretty fingers some of the dishes assumed fantastic appearance. A boar was served up in the form of a serpent, the hare with the ears of a cat.

It was Louis XIV. who had the Épine Dîné—le bonne épine—he called it—brought from the East; and it is to his old age that we are indebted for liqueurs. Thirst had increased in the age of progress, and that difficulty to live which so often manifests itself about sixty. Brandy, mixed with sugar and perfumes, was substituted to him in a potion he called "Cordial potions." This was the origin of liqueurs. It may be observed that about this same period the chicken was flourished par excellence in England. Queen Anne was fond of good cheer. She did not think it beneath her dignity to converse with her cook; and English cookery-books, many of them "after Queen Anne's fashion."

The Duke de Richelieu, a grand gourmand, worthy of friendship, invited his friends to repasts as delicate as they were well selected. From the most authentic source we learn that the most delicate pigeon, morceaux as tasty as on the river's banks, and turkeys gloriously truffled, were the favorites.

Fortunately we have been attributed to the Duke de Richelieu the following anecdote, which gives our opinion much weight:

The Duke invited

"Kittie, my child, I am astonished at your remarks as well as at your condescension. Won't your grandfather a South Carolinian?"

"One of my grandfathers; so at least I have been very often told. The other was a Massachusetts Yankee. Do you wonder that truth and error struggle within me so mightily?"

Kittie could not help saying such naughty things that bright May morning, so overflowing was her heart with life and joy.

Mrs. Harris did not comprehend all which her daughter's words implied. Not so with the sharpwitted "Cracker" woman.

"That girl is entirely the most audacious thing ever I did see. She's grown altogether too large to her age.

These observations, though made in an undertone, were distinctly audible to every one in the cabin, as two persons intended it to be. Perhaps Colonel Hamilton looked annoyed, and it strengthened the opinion I had before formed of his interest in Miss Kittie. Mrs. Harris was more than annoyed: she was insulted; and her outraged feelings must have expression.

"You are a very impertinent woman! If you can not make use of less offensive language I shall beg you to retire."

"Oh, mamma," interrupted Miss Kittie, who saw at once the absurdity of asserting rank or place on a public boat, "you have misunderstood. I began it myself, all in play, and gave occasion for saying even severer things. We'll call it quits, now, and behave ourselves, won't we?" she said, smiling at the rustic group before us.

"If you've had enough so have I," said the spirited woman, in a good-natured way; and swords were sheathed.

Robert, who, as usual, had remained quiet, smiled approvingly, and said to Miss Kittie,

"Suppose we go and make a reconnoissance? Will not Mrs. Harris accompany us to the upper deck?"

Mrs. Harris said she preferred remaining with Chris in the cabin, and lowered what little strength she had for a ramble on shore.

Colonel Hamilton, who stood deferentially waiting her reply, now offered me his arm for a promenade. I hesitated a moment, then accepted it, and we followed Robert and Kittie.

Beneath the white awning a few couple were moving slowly through a Spanish dance—the favorite dance of the country. Every movement of the Minorcan girls was in harmony with the graceful measure; every expression of their mobile features united with the wavy tones of the music. To watch them was like listening to a charming poem under the blue skies of summer.

"Are you really so fond of dancing, Miss Miller?" Colonel Hamilton inquired, as I stood wholly absorbed in their many movements.

"Yes; I love it like any divine accord."

"Will you dance with me?" he requested a moment after, in a lower tone; "I see they are arranging for another set."

I looked to see if he were in earnest. Very grave was the expression with which he regarded me; and I felt certain that my eyes, as they fell upon the black dress, and then more timidly, unfairly toward my brother, filled with tears. I was ashamed of the emotion which had betrayed me from replying, and turned away to conceal it.

A moment after I felt the tending of his tall figure toward me again, and heard him say, in a tender, troubled tone, almost a whisper,

"Forgive me my unfortunate words, Miss Miller, and believe that I sought to give you pleasure instead of pain."

He went away then, and I saw no more of him until he came to say the plantation-grove was in sight, indicating the direction with his finger. A solitary pine on the summit of a lofty mound was distinctly visible. "Another hour or less," he said, "would bring us to anchor within a hundred yards of the shore. Major Thomson had brought his own boat for the use of our party, or we should not be so favorably off after the steamer east anchor."

Preparations were made to dine before leaving the boat. Tables were spread in both cabins, laden with substantials and delicacies—chickens, wild game, and oysters, the latter with the inevitable bacon—the sine qua non of a Southern meal. The aroma of coffee was diffused far and wide. I can not say that the appetite was done to the tempting viands, for it was early to dine, and, moreover, every one appeared to be thinking more of the coming ride than the pleasure ahead than of eating. The table-committee proposed that every thing should remain until the exercise on shore had produced better appetite.

It was a time of general excitement when the steamer cast anchor, and her two small boats were brought along-side. Every one was in haste to debark; few were willing to wait even a second passage to the landing; but those few, amidst the eager, loading throng, shone brightly conspicuous. Miss Kittie was one of these, and never looked lovelier than when she whispered to Mr. Thomson, whose boat was just along-side,

"There is a dreadfully disappointed party! Let us wait a little and they are gratified."

"I will do no such thing, Miss Kittie! Who, I beg to know, needs more time to climb the bluff than our own party of invalids? Not a remonstrance, Miss Kittie! I've seen this scrambling operation before, and came quite independent of it. When my own guests are waited upon my boat and boatmen are at the service of the party, not before."

Two or three women and children, who had rushed forward into the yawl, were politely handed out by the inflexible proprietor. There was some doubt whether our own party could all go together, and Miss Kittie again insisted that we would be left if any one. Mr. Thomson tried to speak gruffly and look savagely at her while he helped her to the seat beside her mother.

"Take care of her now, Madam," he said, addressing himself to Mrs. Harris. "A pretty mess she was near getting me into by persisting in gratifying those intrepid women who know no more of politeness than a parcel of tom-noddies. They used to come it over me to my cost; but I am no longer to be victimized."

"I am very glad," said Mrs. Harris, "you have succeeded in your move up the bay, where you could be taught proper distinctions of rank of fortune. Often's the time she's come to me to switch her, to save some child of a turkey who had got into mischief."

"At my instigation, no doubt, mother. But just look ahead. Don't you see that nice old gentleman waving his hand to us? He must have enjoyed your fun. But I intend to have him my gallant to-day. I give you fair warning."

"The old gentleman is Captain Philippe, the owner of the plantation," Colonel Hamilton said; and he arose and waved his hat in token of recognition.

The place, like most on the bay, was guiltless of wharf; but the prow of the little Sylph ran boldly into the sand on the beach; we were then enabled to go ashore dry-shod. The old man welcomed our party with the most cordial kindness, shaking each one by the hand with the warmth of an old acquaintance, and kissing the ladies with true French gallantry. To Kittie and myself he made an extra bow, saying, gayly, to the Colonel who introduced us,

"Tuiere-vous! Je veux avoir!"

To which he replied in the same tone,

"J'en suis au desespoir!"

"How else! Let us all speak French this afternoon," said Miss Kittie! "Monsieur Philippe, est ce-là le chemin de l'orangerie? Je suis enchantée!"

The manner was irresistible, and we started for "l'orangerie" without delay. A short walk led us through the shade of trees, and a gentle promontory, then a gradual ascent to the region of beauty. Magnificent orange and shaddock trees, grouped with the live-oak, covered the entire year, and laden with new bloom, were visible here and there on every hand. Some fruit had been drawn us aside but for the determined words of our venerable escort.

"Don't touch, mesdemoiselles! Fine in ze orchard! pleuty fine! O mon Dieu! dat's notsin'!"

We passed the residence of the old gentleman on our way, half-buried in oleanders and figtrees. It was a miserable, tumble-down looking concern in itself, built of logs and clay, standing several feet above the ground upon wooden blocks. Rude steps led up to a front piazza, all overrun with clustering roses and honeysuckle, which glorified the place, and made the rude benches beneath more inviting to repose than the costly sofas of many a palace-mansion.

"L'asile," he said, observing our eyes turned toward the dwelling. "Rustique, but très confortable."

The gate of orange-wood swung open at the old man's touch, and then we were fairly ushered! As far as the eye could extend were walks of live-oak and myrtle, and beneath the fruit larger and finer than were ever seen beyond their native groves. Those of our company who had preceded us were in the midst, some scattered beneath the trees, pealing and eating the luscious oranges which lay on every side. Down one arcade, where the trees were until wearry, then sat down to finish our repast. Several men were picking fruit for market—" much more than usual," the proprietor said—because so South care more for cannon-ball now zan zey vere ongaze."

When rested and satiated with fruit, Colonel Hamilton proposed we should visit the mound and lime-pyramid, which was the only thing in an opposite direction. On our way we passed fig-trees laden with fruit; bananas, golden and creamy, waiting to be plucked; pomegranate by the very odor of the little jelly-boxes we sometimes get at the North, and pomegranate-trees without number. A little patch of Spanish-wetting planted like cabbages we found to be pine-apples, the leaves had not seen to be gathered.

In all the South is no lovelier spot than the plantation of the old Frenchman on Tampa Bay. We thought, after the mound, that the ascent which brought us to the summit of the lofty mound reared by De Soto and his unhappy companions, there could be no lovelier view in the world. With the exception of a little opening toward the bay, the sides of the mound are planted all around with trees in the early days of the adventure, with an open area on the top surrounded by a single lofty pine-tree, visible at sea.

Standing beneath that ancient tree, gazing Guilfward, what a pleasant chat we had about the adventurous Spaniards! How much of enthusiasm, their toil, privations, and disappointments! "No wonder," we said, "that in a spot so enchanting the old Castilian should have dreamed of waters of immortality! No wonder, in a clime where winter never frowns rudely on the verdure of summer, where flowers never fade and the air is always soft and balmy, he should have sought for an earthly paradise in vain!"

"And some of us are scarcely less credulous now," Robert said, smiling, I thought, a little coldly, though his eyes sought me with a look glowed with pleasure.

"All the world is credulous, and superstitious, too," quickly responded Miss Kittie, with a look which seemed to say, "We came here for a good time, and don't let a shadow fall upon us to-day." "Isn't so, Miss Margy? Hadn't you rather see the new moon over your right shoulder than your left? I had a hundred times. But don't you wish now we had the old Spanish flag to raise here on De Soto's fortification this afternoon?"

"I do indeed!" I answered. "I would sooner see it float over this whole country again than that detestable rebel rag yonder;" and I pointed to a secession flag waving from a schooner-mast in the bay.

"You speak very warmly, Miss Miller," Colonel Hamilton said, with one of the darkest of his dark frowns. "That rebel rag, as you call it, is destined to command the respect of nations, and to find its way into every port of the civilized world."

"Confusion to traitors!" I exclaimed, meeting his dark glance defiantly. "May they all perish like Arnold, grave diggers designed as Benedict Arnold and Aaron Burr!"

"All you Northerners want is our darkeys," whined Mrs. Harris.

The old Frenchman was on his feet in a moment.

"You look here!" he said. "See zat licette pig smuffing at ze sour lime. Not one bit will he taste it. He plides in ze sweet orange and ze ripe fat. Ze sweet orange make ze very best pig. What for you will eat sour fruit here to-day, when ze sweet is plenty?"

Captain Philippe's analogy was too original and too just not to produce its desired effect. We laughed, grasped the old man's hand, and promised to eat only sweet fruit while we remained with him at least.

We did not break our promise. Here and there through the fragrant groves we strayed, examining curiously the fortifications, laughing in pleasant speculations relative to the experience of that first adventurous band whose earthworks had defied the hand of Time. Something more we longed to know of those brave, honorable men than history or tradition has yet unfolded.

Too soon came the shrill retinga-call from The Socotra Chief. The gentlemen purchased fruit until the Captain of the steamer refused to take it aboard, saying, if they persisted, we should all get as much as sure as fate.

The sun was low in the west when the last boat from shore discharged its human freight: the tents in the offing quickly grew to weigh anchor and depart.

The second call to dinner was responded to with greater alacrity than the first had been. I was left quite alone on the upper deck, feeling no desire for food. The distant charm possessed me. Seldom had I seen the tropic green clothed with the gold and purple of the evening clouds before, and I felt that no change could give to glory until my heart was full to bursting. Thoughts of our far-away Northern home came to me like visions of the fearful mysteries of another May sunset, on whose wings a serene soul passed from the evening of earth to the blessed morning of heaven. My eyes grew dim to the beauty before me, but they could not be allowed the luxury of tears while every drop was sternly remanded to its fountain.

At that moment a soft sound of footsteps startled me; it was a stealthy sound. Followed soon by a servant with a tray of coffee, which was accepted without remark. Miss Kittie came next to say there would be music in the cabin as soon as the tables were removed, and that the invalids had decided to return to the upper deck. She was going down to have a dance if she could find a partner.

In a moment she was gone, and other footsteps drew near.

"Allow me to take your cup, Miss Miller," it was Major Thomson who spoke.

"You seem a little sad this evening. I trust no thoughtless word of mine has wounded you."

The kindness of his voice prevented the reply which trembled on my lips, "that his words had no power to wound me." I simply answered that a person might be meditative and not sad.

"True," he replied, "but you are a little sad nevertheless. Let me console you by saying I have never seen your brother as well since his arrival as now. He was just telling me that he looks like a person in returning health."

"God grant it! Without him life were nothing to me. Let us join him if he will not return on deck."

"Will you not allow me a moment's conversation first?"

"Certainly, Sir, it you have any thing to communicate;" and I resumed my seat.

He went away for a moment and returned.

"I will not detain you long," he said, noticing perhaps ill-concealed reluctance on my part to listen. "I know that your brother's consent to speak to you, but no encouragement from him whatever that my words would avail me. I can not leave this place without revealing to you my real feelings. Robert has become like a brother to me, Miss Margy, are dearer than sister to brother."

I was thunder-struck, and stared at him inincredulously.

"I have not deceived myself with the belief that I have interested you. Only say that you will distrust me, as I have sometimes distrusted, and that I may cultivate your esteem, and I will rest contented for the present."

I could not have surprised me more than your words, Colonel Hamilton. I will be as frank as yourself. If esteem is of any value to you, you have won it already by your kindness to my brother. I can never cease to appreciate it. But I will not deceive you: I will not suffer you to believe me susceptible of any warmer regard."

"Don't speak for the future, Miss Margy. Your decision for the present I must accept."

"I must speak for the future, Sir! I can not forget what barriers are rising higher and higher every day to separate the North from the South."

"What are barriers to love?" he interrupted. "You have heart-lessons to learn yet, dear Miss Miller, if you believe affection will not overleap all boundaries, social or political. Warmly as I love the South, identified as are my interests with her interests forever, my heart at this moment accords to a Northerner such reverence as it has never yielded before."

"You have been married, Colonel Hamilton?"

"Very happily."

"I do not comprehend you. Let us go down."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A YOUNG lady has been heard to declare that she couldn't go to light for the country, but she was willing to allow the young men to go, and die on old moist, which she thought was as great a sacrifice as any body could be called upon to make.

BY A LEATHERHEAD.—The saying that "there is nothing like leather" is justified by the fact that it is our sole reliance.

"When things get to be worst they generally take a turn for the better." This proverb applies more particularly to a lady's style dress, when she can not get a new one.

Why are women who endure matrimony like railroad trains?—Because their failure to connect occasions much disappointment.

A learned coxcomb once said to a witness, "Sir, did I not see you at the theatre on the evening of the representation of the pleiniff?" "I know not what you may have understood," said the witness, "but if my eyes served me properly, I certainly did witness a manœuvre that would attract much attention."

The only ever-lasting people on earth are the shoemakers.

A paper refused lately to publish eulogies gratis, but added, "We will publish the simple announcement of the death of any of our friends with pleasure."

In a late number of a New York paper a new announcement of a lady's death appears, terminating thus: "Friends will kindly accept this announcement as her removal."

A rich man made his will, leaving all he had to a company of fellow-citizens to dispose of, but reserving to his right hon'ble friend a portion as pleased himself. The latter having sent the company for his share of the property, the lawyer inquired whether they wished to carry out the will of the testator, and if so, what provision they proposed making for the latter? "He stole about a tenth part," said they, "and we will retain for ourselves the other nine."

"Now, my son," said the judge, "the tenth part is yourselves, and leave the rest to the heir; for by the will he is to have what part pleases him."

FLEET OF WHALERS IN THE PORT OF SAN FRANCISCO.—[SKETCHED BY M. C. PALMER.]

FLEET OF WHALERS AT SAN FRANCISCO.

WE give herewith an illustration representing the Fleet of Whalers in the port of San Francisco. Our correspondent, in a letter dated October 29, says that during a few previous days no less than twenty-four whalers had arrived from the Arctic ocean. The presence of so many whalers in the port at one time had never before been known; perhaps half a dozen on one occasion has been the highest number previously reached. For several years past the whaling fleet has rather avoided San Francisco, and which is chiefly indebted for its recent presence to the facility afforded by this port for instant telegraphic communication with owners at New Bedford, whose wishes as to the disposition of cargoes can thus be immediately ascertained. The number of whales is said to be diminishing yearly, and eminent scientific authorities have advocated a cessation of the fishery for a period of years.

APPARATUS FOR MEASURING THE VELOCITY OF PROJECTILES.

WE give on this page an illustration of the ELECTRO-BALLISTIC APPARATUS, recently invented by Major NAVEZ, of the Belgian Artillery, for measuring the space of time a cannon-ball would take in passing over a few yards. Let two upright screens be placed before the gun, the first distant 50 yards and the second 150 yards. Between the screens is 100 yards; what time is taken by the cannon-ball in passing from the first screen to the second? The same pendulum always performs its vibrations, whatever be the extent of the arc, in the same time. A seconds pendulum will tick seconds, whether the arc passed over be ten or forty degrees. If, then, a pendulum can be set in motion when the cannon-ball penetrates the first screen, and stopped when the second screen is reached, the arc over which it passes during the interval would be an exact measure of the time occupied. As the whole arc, fully completed, is to the partial arc, so is the time of describing the whole arc to the time of describing the partial arc.

The real thing to be accomplished is to start and stop the pendulum at precisely the right moment. This is accomplished by the principle of magnetism. Two pendulums are used, which, by means of a spring, are made to move in exact unison. One of these is called the main pendulum; the other, which is smaller and more delicate, the index pendulum. The main pendulum is connected with the first screen by means of a magnetic line, going and returning, so as to form a current. When the ball strikes the first screen the current between it and the main pendulum is broken; this pendulum, which has previously been held by the magnet, is now, at the breaking of the current, set in motion, the index pendulum keeping exact pace with it. Now the pendulums are in motion; but when the ball strikes the second screen how are they to be stopped? A separate contrivance, called the Conjunctor, is connected with this screen by a magnetic current, which is broken by the passage of the ball. The Conjunctor is so contrived that, at the breaking of this current, a new current is established between a large magnetic battery and the index pendulum; and the moment this is accomplished the latter is stopped, being attracted to the iron arc along which it is moving. The new current was established by the pressure of a steel needle downward into a jar of mercury at the breaking of the current between the Conjunctor and the second screen. The problem is now solved. Suppose that, when the index is stopped, two degrees have been passed over of an arc which, completed, would measure forty degrees; and suppose that our pendulum ticks seconds. Then the time taken by the cannon-ball in passing the 150 yards is one-twentieth of a second, one yard being passed in one-twenty-four-hundredth part of a second. By this contrivance a skillful operator is able to measure pretty accurately to the three-thousandth part of a second.

PETROLEUM.

Our readers will find in Nos. 414 and 415 of Harper's Weekly an advertisement of the New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company. Daniel S. Dickinson is the President, and he is associated with gentlemen of experience in the business. A careful study of the Prospectus will reveal the advantages of the investment. The discovery of Petroleum is so recent, and the necessary demand so large and increasing, that this Company may be said to proceed upon a permanent basis. Their Prospectus speaks modestly and fairly, and the name of Mr. Dickinson, who has here, we believe, for the first time associated his name with any corporate enterprise, should satisfy the inquirer that it is not a mere speculation. All of the funds paid in forms the working capital of the Company, and no commission with it is interested in selling the Company land or property at a fictitious value or at any profit. Stockholders, therefore, are mainly interested in the profits of the Company. A limited number of shares are offered at a subscription price of five dollars per share, without further tax or assessment, which is but half the par value. Several of the trustees are located in the oil regions, and have acquired their wealth and experience in the business, and have a personal supervision over the Company's affairs, and it is expected that large quarterly dividends will be regularly paid from the 1st of January. Subscriptions at the price indicated will only be received during the present month. Office of the Company, 71 Broadway, New York. Post-office box, 5508.

SYRIA THE JEWESS;

OR,

THE MAGICIAN OF TOLEDO.

By LOUIS LEON,

Author of
"The Silver Ship" and "Step-Daughter's Portion."

"Stand back, false Lord!" my young Joan cries,
"Not touch the maiden fair!"
"She is a Jewess!" quick replies,
Thereat Joan's proud heart doth rise.
"She is a woman!" thunders forth
Young Joan in reply;
"And holds a Christian's plighted troth,
So touch her not, false lord!"

With the new year comes a glorious addition to the current literature of the season. Take of the kind which most fires the young blood, which glows the brightest in song and story, and which fills the soul with delicious aspirations and fancies!—And which the immortal genius of Byron has described as strikingly as tritely,

"Oh, lovely Spain! renown'd, romantic land!"

The heroine of this magnificent romance is a Jewess, one of those dark-eyed maidens of the East who thrill the heart and fascinate the eye of the observer. Whoever reads her thoughts or traces her actions will be reminded of the beautiful Rachel and Ruth, and other Jewish heroines of the Bible—and the fearful persecutions of Christian, the beautiful Rebecca. Indeed, she has the sweetness of Queen Esther, blended with the strength and dignity of Ruth, and the angelic like purity and stern resolve of Rebecca. The only child of Ben Israel, the merry-hearted of Toledo, in Spain, she was the sole cynosure of his Spanish eyelid, and when her people were subjected to persecution and wrong, that record of her career is full of lofty faith, of dauntless hopefulness, of pride and chivalry, of high dark and lurid events which belong peculiarly to her sex.

By the magic pen of its popular author, the reader of

SYRIA THE JEWESS,

OR,

The Magician of Toledo,

will be enabled to live amid the entrancing scenes of those olden times. The wicked chancellor of the King, his robbers which have ever cursed the country, the sufferings of the Jews under the edict of banishment, the tragic voyages of plague-ships on the Mediterranean Sea, the cruel breaks of nuns in the cities of Spain, and all the features of those tempestuous times, are woven in this marvellous story.

But better than all the excitement and mystery with which

SYRIA THE JEWESS,

OR,

The Magician of Toledo,

teems; better than all, the harsh deeds of its hero, the young sorrowful Jewess, and the bitter loss of her life, the startling acts and associations of the terrible magician, with his fiendish secrets and purposes—far better than any of these transient emotions—will be the moral effect and the pleasant influence which will ever derive from these pages. The whole progress of the beautiful Jewess is a consoling as thrilling. Placed, like the great prototypes to whom we have named, in position of trial and of danger, her soul rises nobly to its duties, and in every line is shown the glory of a consistent religion and the nobleness of a true life. Like another Ruth, or Rachel, or Rebecca, she will win the hearts of all who read her story, and make every reader wiser and better.

This graphic revelation of manly heroism and womanly gentleness and affection is now running through the columns of the

New York Weekly,

the favorite family Journal of America. The old and young, every lady and gentleman, indeed the whole universal public, will be captivated and delighted with it.

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY is sold by all respectable News Agents throughout the United States. The price is SIX CENTS, but in some cases where Agents have to pay extra freight or postage, a higher price is necessarily charged. When there is no Agent, single copies will be sent to friends to get the WEEKLY through him. We do not wish to mail the publication to subscribers, except by other means of getting it. When sent by mail, the price will invariably be $3 00 a year, in advance. Subscription terms for three months, $1 00. No subscriptions are taken at par for subscriptions. Canada subscribers must send one dollar extra with every subscription to prepay the American postage.

DYSPEPSIA
AND Costiveness Cured.

D. J. TENNY'S CASE.—New York Mentor, January 14, 1860.—Whether the Brandreth Pill is ever convertible into bread we will not now discuss. But our chief object at this time is to give a statement of a gentleman who says he has taken one of the Brandreth Pills, for at least sixteen months, by about 60 days in succession, and who says that at the end of that time he considered himself cured of Dyspepsia, attended by a constant costive state of the bowels, which had troubled him for a long time.

This gentleman, Mr. Daniel J. Tenny, resides at the Astor House, in this city, and has been in the employment of excellent health ever since he was cured by this treatment. He is an intelligent man, and there is no doubt of the truth of his statement. This person is but one of as many as one of the Pills prepared by Dr. Brandreth can be taken for nearly 500 days in succession without harm, and at the end of that time a regular and costive habit of body may be perfectly cured. This could not be said of any of the cathartics in use by those who style themselves the Regular Faculty.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See you B. B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

Important to Subscribers.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY will find upon the wrapper of each Number a Statement of Account. The figures on the direction-label following the name show the month with which the Subscription EXPIRES, as noted on our books. Every Subscriber should examine this label, and if any error appear, prepaid for his remittance, and also when to renew his Subscription. Those having Subscriptions to Harper's Periodicals are particularly requested to send the LABEL with the name and address, when writing to have a change made in the name or address, or a discontinuance.

It is desirable that a Remittal should be received a few days before the Publication of the Number with which it begins, in order that our books may be kept properly adjusted. A Postmaster can always procure a Receipt for the money he incloses in a letter, and should always do so. Otherwise he does so at his own risk. Money sent in accordance with these directions is at the risk of the Publishers.

TESTIMONIAL FROM THE MOST DISTINGUISHED ARTISTS TO STEINWAY & SONS.

New York, December, 1864.

The Piano Fortes, Grand, Square, and Upright, manufactured by Messrs. Steinway & Sons, have established for themselves so well-earned a reputation that it is hardly necessary for us to add our testimony to their merits. Many thousands of families and their instruments present, daily for years, both in public and private use, afford a more pleasant duty to express our candid opinion regarding their unquestioned superiority over any other pianos known to us.

Among the chief points of their uniform excellence are:—Greatest possible depth, richness, and volume of tone, combined with a rare brilliancy, clearness, and perfect evenness throughout the entire scale, and above all a surprising duration of sounds, the pure and sympathetic quality of which never changes under the most delicate or powerful touch. This peculiarity is found exclusively in the Steinway Piano, and together with the matchless precision, elasticity, and promptness of action always characterizing these instruments, as well as their unequaled durability under the severest trials, is truly surprising, and claims at once the admiration of every artist. We, therefore, consider the "Steinway" Pianos in all respects by far the best instruments made in this country or Europe, are thus solely and exclusively ourselves, in public or private, and recommend them invariably to our friends and the public.

We have, at different times, entrusted our opinions regarding the pianos of various makers, but freely and unhesitatingly pronounce Messrs. Steinway & Sons, Manufacturers, both grand and square, incomparably superior to them all.

ROYAL VICTORIA HOTEL.

This Hotel, situated at NASSAU, NEW PROVIDENCE, BAHAMAS, was built by the Colonial Government, and is a noble stone edifice, 200 feet long, erected on a elevation a few minutes' walk from the shore, and commanding a fine view of the ocean, harbor, and town of Nassau.

Surrounding the Hotel is a piazza ten feet wide, from which the inmates can at all times enjoy the gentle, cooling, easterly trade-winds. INVALIDS unable to bear much fatigue will have a promenade extending one thousand feet, level, without leaving the building. All of the TROPICAL FRUITS grow in great abundance, and are in season the entire year.

But little rain falls from the month of October to the first of June. THUS IS CONSIDERED THE PECULIAR SEASON FOR INVALIDS, though they can reside the entire year with comfort and safety. The route are unexcelled, and kept in good order. A most BEAUTIFUL DRIVE extends for twelve miles along the sea shore. In fact, every thing conducive to make it a pleasant home for the robust as well as for the invalid.

The Lessee of the Hotel has recently secured the services of Mr. James Correll, late of the "NEW YORK HOTEL," who will have the entire superintendence, and is determined to do all in his power to minister to the wants and comforts of his guests.

The CULINARY and other departments shall be well supplied with the best the market can obtain, and the servants attentive and unobtrusive.

The CUNARD CO.'S STEAM-SHIP CORSICA leaves the wharf at Jersey City and New York once a month for NASSAU. The fare to Nassau is forty-five dollars. The charges for board are Three Dollars ($3 00) per day.

Carriages and horses for rides may be hired at reasonable rates.

CHRISTMAS.

It is a merry Christmas although the cloud of war yet rests upon the land. It is merry because the great gale of victory parts the cloud, and gives glimpses of the heaven of peace beyond. It is merry because every man feels now that the people are able to subdue the rebellion; and moreover of all because they have just declared that they will do it, and show from the Mississippi to the sea that they are doing it.

Yet now, as from the beginning of the war, the purpose of the country is only peace and good-will to all men. It has learned that a peace which it simply unquestioning submission to the meanest injustice is only more fearful war. Neither baseness nor cowardice are peace, except as death is. War is sorrowful, but there is one thing infinitely more horrible than the worst horrors of war, and that is the feeling that nothing is worth fighting for, and the blindness which does not see that war is often the safest, surest, shortest, and least bloody way of peace.

More truly than ever before the legend of this country is good-will to all men. If it will hold fast to it peace is forever secure. The strongest and most unfailing force in the world is a man. The most visionary and impracticable of men is he who sneers at ideas. If this famously practical people had not hitherto believed in principles it would have had no civil war. If it will only cleave hereafter to the principles it now acknowledges it will never have war again. It is bullies and bad men who are always fighting. It is the just men who are at peace.

To-day, then, under the Christmas evergreen, the country sat only for peace, and broadest only good-will to all men. Despite the sharp war, its bountiful feast is spread. It stands, as Mr. NAST represents in the large picture in to-day's Number, holding the door open to welcome the rebellious children back to the family banquet. It does not forget one of their crimes. It remembers the enormity of their offence. It will take good care that the root of bitterness be destroyed forever, and that the peace of the household shall be henceforth secure. But it asks what it can command. It invites where it can enforce. It says now, as it has said from the beginning, "Submit to the laws made by all for the common welfare, and there will be no more war."

Nor does that country for a moment forget the sad and solitary hearts and hearths upon which the light of the holy season shines. It is a grief too deep for anger, and it requires that such sorrow as this Christmas can bring shall be made impossible hereafter. They rest from their labors, the young and brave who have made this country better worth living in. The mothers that are broken with those completed lives time will soothe, but can never wholly heal. Yet never did seed seem more surely sown to spring and crown the happy harvest-home than those precious lives. In a deeper national faith, in a purer nationhood, in sobered, serious, and nobler individual lives the harvest of that heroism shall be seen.

"Come home—come home, then," says the mother. "While you refuse you shall be scourged with fire. I have no anger. Your crime grew because I suffered it to grow. I have no anger, for in the heart-blood of my darlings my sin is washed away. I ask for peace, I breathe only good-will. But Peace you have learned that I mean to have!"

GENERAL THOMAS.

THE indomitable soldier who saved the day for us at Chickamauga after the commanding General supposed it to be lost, has won another and decisive victory before Nashville; and the name of THOMAS is henceforth as popularly precious as that of GRANT, of SHERMAN, and of SHERIDAN. The management of the Tennessee campaign has been masterly even to eyes that are not military. SHERMAN confided to him that part of the country. HOOD's victory would have been SHERMAN's humiliation as well as THOMAS's defeat; but SHERMAN knew his man, and THOMAS knew his men, and simultaneously with SHERMAN's arrival upon the coast HOOD is driven back, baffled and routed and disgraced.

Poor General HOOD went upon a fool's errand, and JEFFERSON DAVIS retires in sorrow to the rear of the Yankees; announce to the Georgians that Sherman's return was to be more terrible than that of NAPOLEON from Russia; utter at Macon, Augusta, and Columbia a few hysterical sneers and cries, hasten home to Richmond to watch the game—and presto! in two months HOOD is routed, and SHERMAN has victoriously traversed Georgia to the sea.

These are facts which every rebel can plainly mark. They can see how SHERMAN has handled DAVIS, as the elephant disposes of the boll in the Bengazoo arena. They can see that the elephant gazes at him, and as the furious animal plunges toward him, with one blow of the elephant's trunk he is thrown by the ring-nose, and with one pressure of his foot he is trampled to death. DAVIS, with every other rebel, has found his master.

And while the air rings with victory it is impossible not to contrast the present command of our armies with that of previous years. Against the Union armies, with GRANT, SHERMAN, SHERIDAN, and THOMAS at their heads, what have the rebels to show? After LEE at Richmond, who has given himself to the task of defensive and a very poor aggressive soldier, there are some partisan chiefs, and then nothing. Neither BEAUREGARD, nor BRAGG, nor HARDEE, nor EARLY, nor LONGSTREET, nor JOE JOHNSTON have shown great military genius. They were the favorites so many of our minor Generals, but while we have patiently endured the winnowing of time, and are at length rewarded with truly remarkable soldiers, the rebels had exhausted theirs at first. And from the moment that the United States began to be relieved of its fancy and political generals our success has been steadily increasing. The only real disaster to the Union cause during the last year was the disgraceful Red River expedition, and that was accomplished by a soldier. No man could ask for a more able leadership of our armies and navies than that they have.

And let no skeptic say that HOOD's army will only withdraw and must be defeated again; and that therefore no real advantage is gained. For although THOMAS should be as unable to cut the English did the French army after Waterloo, yet HOOD's army deprived of fifty guns, with thousands of its men, and several of its chief officers captured, with the consciousness of total failure in its attempt, and of a tottering cause all around it, may be a strong still, but it is not the same army that with foolish pride invested Nashville. It is not an army that can impede or perplex General THOMAS. The year ends in national glory: let it also end in national gratitude.

THE UNITED STATES AND ENGLAND.

THE speech made by Professor GOLDWIN SMITH on the evening before the news from England is described as sad. It is not surprising that it was so when we reflect how determined the rebel instigators of war in this country and in England are to make us so. It is not surprising that it was so when we reflect how determined the rebel instigators of war in this country, while they thoughtful American and Englishman, knows that such an event would be a profound misfortune to civilization itself.

Certainly it should be enough to make the most exasperated enemy of England pause, to reflect that his wrath is used by rebel emissaries as a tool against the whole country. Is there a thing that would set all the bells of Richmond ringing, that would be more than an offset to SHERMAN's and THOMAS's victories, more than new LEE's arm to strike more cheerfully and heavily at GRANT, is a menacing difficulty, and unlikely a war, with England. The rebels and all the rebel agents in Canada are working; and if this foolish Justice COURSAL could, by his release of the St. Alban raiders, occasion war, a cause of lead would justly be given to Canada by the rebel Congress, as the greatest benefactor of the rebellion.

That the governing class in England are, as a body, opposed to us is true, and the reason of the opposition is obvious. The only excuse for a monarchy is its cheapness. It is a better police or it is nothing. But if it can be shown that a nation can govern itself and suppress a fearful rebellion, and conduct a general and most exciting election in the midst of civil war with perfect tranquility, then a republican form is demonstrated to be cheaper, easier, and better, and what can a monarchy say for itself? The objection to our system has hitherto been that it was never tried. In June, on a calm sea, your pretty yacht sails smoothly enough, has been the cry, wait until January and a tempest; they are now here, and if out of the tornado the yacht safely emerges, the critics must be dumb. The aristocratic or feudal form has sincerely disbelieved in our popular system. It could not with it success. Its success was its own destruction. Therefore, with few exceptions, the aristocracy of England has been against us, and the commercial class, which hopes one day to be aristocratic, follows in its wake. The aristocrats and the snobs are our enemies. But they are not England.

Not only GOLDWIN SMITH says that "the main body" of the English people are not against us, but EARL RUSSELL at Blairgowrie, more than a year ago, distinctly avowed that the British Government would be neutral because the majority of the people sympathized with the Government of the United States. These are witnesses from both sides. GOLDWIN SMITH is one of "the main body" for which he speaks. Lord RUSSELL is one of the governing class, which the opinion of the main body controls.

Now although it is true that the aristocracy directs the acts of the Government, it has no card in that direction to the popular sentiment. It stopped the rams very decidedly, not only because it was told that it should regard their departure as a virtual declaration of war, but because it knew that a war with the United States would not be popular in England. The English and a hundred years ago, which was that of the aristocracy unchecked by the people, would have long since recognized the rebel Confederacy and made war upon us. But as governments come to represent the people, directly or indirectly, they grow wiser. It is the people that pays, the people that fights, the people that suffers, and they will not blindly or foolishly rush to war. In our own case the British aristocracy, the party of the rebel sentiment in Europe and Canada, would gladly embroil the two nations. But what have the American people to say? What people to gain by war?

National honor is not vindicated by giving way to passion or prejudice. A hot and furious nation is no more respectable a sight than an angry man. The hasty insolence of manner in a government should no more disturb the national equanimity than the superciliousness of an English lord should exasperate a cool American gentleman. He is a gentleman who keeps his temper, and whoever keeps his temper best respects his character and defends his life.

If the sound public sense of England can not restrain its Government from direct or indirect acts of injury and insult upon this country, war will, of course, follow, sooner or later. But, meanwhile, let us all carefully discriminate our friends from our enemies, nor be swift to suppose that the aristocracy represents the English national acts. The meeting in Liverpool to protest against the escape of the Alabama was quite as significant as many of the vessel. The timely detention of the rams by Earl RUSSELL was quite as important a fact as the rescue of the rebel Semmes. The English "sympathy" and the repudiation by the Canadian authorities of the judgment of COURSAL is a much weightier event than that Dogberry's release of the St. Alban robbers.

GENERAL DIX'S ORDER.

IN view of the information in his possession of contemplated raids, and of the formal release of the St. Alban robbers and murderers, General DIX could not do less than authorize the pursuit of invaders upon our soil wherever they might flee for refuge. For the solemn judgment of a court must be held to be final until it is reversed, or until it is repudiated by the executive authority of the Government, and meanwhile the frontier is exposed to raid, invasion and massacre. But when the President learned the prompt disavowal by the Canadian Government of the action of Justice COURSAL, and, in turn, resolved to avoid unnecessary complication by revoking the order. For if Canada means to guard her own frontier it is much better that she should do it than we.

Yet General DIX's order was not necessarily, in an offensive sense, hostile. The decision of COURSAL was not a declaration that the people of Canada did not defend a neighboring nation from attacks proceeding from Canadian soil. That is not the opinion of Canada, as expounded by COURSAL, did not maintain her neutrality, and consequently did not protect our rights. In such cases the international custom or law is very clear and unmistakable.

PHILLIMORE, a chief authority upon international law, says: "A rebellion or a civil commotion, it may happen, ignites a nation. While the authorities are engaged in repressing it, bands of rebels pass the frontier to shelter themselves under the protection of the conterminous state, and from thence, with restored strength and fresh appliances, renew their invasion upon the state from which they have escaped. The invaded state remonstrates. The remonstrance, whether from favor to rebels or feebleness of the executive, is neglected, or, at least, only complained of remains unredressed. In this state of things the invaded state is warranted by international law in crossing the frontier and in taking the necessary means for her safety, whether these be the capture or dispersion of the rebels or the destruction of their stronghold, as the exigencies of the case may require."

VATTEL also says: "If his neighbor affords a refuge to his enemies, enabling them to recruit and attack him at leisure, he must either prevent them from so doing, or else they may be sought and fought on his territories."

The release of the St. Alban raiders was, under the circumstances, properly taken as a declaration that the Canadian law can not or will not protect the neighboring nation. For if it were said that the warrant of arrest was not properly signed, the reply was why, in a case so momentous, was it not properly signed? What fleet, of itself, indicated fear or flight? So rebels" which PHILLIMORE cites as justification of pursuit by the aggrieved nation. Or if it were urged that perhaps the 24th of November would be properly signed, and perhaps the next Judge would decide differently, the reply was that in the mean while American citizens might be robbed and murdered. Moreover, there was no reason to suppose that the Canadian Government or people would disavow the decision of COURSAL. They have been uniformly and furiously hostile to us. The same robbers might depart in the same night upon another expedition. General DIX knew that such enterprises were making ready. He could not tell how soon the Government would act, if it acted at all, and it was for the immediate state of things that his order was intended.

The unexpected and entire repudiation of COURSAL's decision, which the Canadian Government is understood to have made, properly terminated the necessity for such an order. If Canada says she will protect our rights upon her soil, she is entitled to expect waiting until the fact is proved either that she can or can not. Nor can the judgment of COURSAL be held to be proof that she will not, since public opinion and the executive authorities refuse to acknowledge it.

ARMING THE SLAVES.

THE Richmond Enquirer declares that the only hope of the rebellion is in arming the negro in destroying its corner-stone. "Let us free and arm the slaves," it says, "to defend a Confederacy whose highest is the recognition of slavery. And General LEE is reported to cry Amen! It is in vain that JEFFERSON DAVIS and his associates insist that they are fighting for State independence, and care nothing for slavery; because the world knows, and they have themselves announced, that they wished to make independence for the purpose of maintaining slavery. They claim that they are essentially a different people; that their social and political institutions are inharmonious with those of the rest of the country; that, in a word, the North and the South are incompatible. If that were so, it is not another way of saying that they cherish slavery, and the rest of the country does not. They began the rebellion to save slavery, and now they propose to abolish slavery to end the rebellion. The military form and the logic of this infamous conspiracy against civil order and human nature break down together. The pretense of Confederate State is as hollow as the "Confederacy." The whole moral and military rebellion is a shell which is gradually crumbling in the grasp of a people faithful to liberty and law.

The practical question of arming the slaves is interesting. What would be the effect of the movement, even if the mere proposal did not cast an apple of discord into the happy family of "free, sovereign, and independent States of the late Southern Confederacy"? Would it prolong the war? Would the slaves fight for the slaveowners?

It is obvious that the large mass of slaves are so ignorant that they might easily believe their masters when told that the Yankees would sell them to Cuba. But the truth is, as the slaveholders themselves and confirmed by universal testimony, that the slaves perfectly understand the war. Notwithstanding our military policy and the opening of the struggle; despite the foolish orders of our Generals, and the painful stupidity of the swaddle that "we don't care about niggers, one hair of a white man's head, or the sympathy of the slaves—they have been patient, intelligent, and sympathetic; always our best friends, our most faithful allies, and ready to our own cause than we ourselves have been. They have never doubted, according to the most trustworthy testimony, any more than the laboring classes of Europe, that the cause of the Union and Government was their cause. The fear of being sold to Cuba or by the Yankees will not be very terrible to them.

There is another important consideration—whether many of the slaves who are attached to their masters and the plantations on which they live will not fight for them? Undoubtedly in some instances this would be the case. But it is the house servants, not the field hands, who would do it; and while the house servants might be willing to defend their homes when they were in imminent personal peril, they would be needed elsewhere to fight; then for the very reason that they are the most intelligent of slaves, they would be the very worst of soldiers in the Southern cause.

The arming of the slaves by the rebels would be the very recklessness of desperation. Under some circumstances it might enable them to hold out a little longer at certain points. But it would give the United States a vast armed militia of resident population in the very district where they will be needed; it would terminate party divisions in the loyal section of the country; and it would settle all cavil about the loyalty of the enormous majority of the people of the revolted section, for when slaves are freed they become, even to the most stupid Northern pander of slavery, "people," if not citizens of men and women.

But such is the present condition of the rebellious section that the urging of the suggestion would probably disintegrate the "nation which Mr. GLADSTONE thinks that JEFFERSON DAVIS has "created."

EARL RUSSELL'S LETTER.

In his reply to the manifesto of the rebel Congress sent to him by Messrs. SLIDELL, MASON, and MANN, Earl RUSSELL makes a singular historical misstatement. "Our British," he says, "was since 1783 remained, with the exception of a short period, connected by friendly relations with both the Northern and Southern States."

Great Britain, his lordship ought to remember, treated in 1783 with commissioners of the United States—a single power—and since 1789 Great Britain has had treaties and relations also with the United States—as single power. Great Britain has had no relations whatever with "Northern and Southern States," for such States are expressly forbidden by the Constitution from entering into any kind of relations with foreign powers. Great Britain has no more been connected with Northern and Southern States than the United States has been connected with Kent, Yorkshire, and Wales. Great Britain has no more been connected with Northern and Southern States in America than with the Department de l'Eure, and Algeria, and Martinique, in the French empire. Has the relations with the Government of France and with the Government of the United States.

In what manner has Great Britain, as LORD RUSSELL declares, had friendly relations with both the Northern and Southern States? He has sent ambassadors to either? Has she made treaties with them? Has she received ministers from either? If, in case of internal commotion in Great Britain, Mr. SEWARD should calmly declare that the United States had always remained connected by friendly relations with the Highlands of Scotland, the city of Dublin, and the Welsh Principality, he would merely show an ill-feeling toward the Government of Great Britain and a ludicrous ignorance.

Nor need it be said that our objection to LORD RUSSELL'S letter shows that sentiment plays neither side. If he had said that the British Government still maintained its neutral position toward the Government of the United States, and those citizens who were endeavoring to cast off its authority, he would have stated the exact truth. But when he speaks of the relations between the Northern and Southern States he implies that the contest is not between a government and insurgents, but between two governments. But if it be between two governments there is no reason why Great Britain, as a neutral power, should not equally recognize both. If France and Spain were at war, Great Britain, as a neutral, could use no other language than she does in regard to our struggle. Of necessity, therefore, she virtually concedes the political existence of the Southern Confederacy, and it is a needless insult to its representatives to designate it as the "so called" Confederacy.

Great Britain, as a government, has laid down the principle that immediately upon the outbreak of a rebellion in a country with which she is at peace she will hasten to invest the rebels with the belligerent rights she concedes to the government. We will not say that she has abused the extraordinary principle she has asserted. But we do say that, viewing the domestic affairs, ill will, for many many years before she will be earnestly praying that other nations may have very short memories or very long forbearance.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

December 14:

In the Senate, joint resolutions were reported from the Naval Committee and passed, tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain Winslow and Lieutenant Cushing. A petition was presented and referred, from several line officers in the army asking for additional compensation. The joint resolution offered and referred on the 13th, declaring free the slave children of colored soldiers, was reported back with the recommendation that it be passed. A number of private petitions were reported; also a bill (Mr. Trumbull, Ill.), which was passed, authorizing the hauling of a special session of the United States District Court in Indiana. Two resolutions (Mr. Chandler, Mich.) were offered. The first resolved that the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of organizing an army corps for the defense of our Canadian border; the second that the Secretary of War make out a list of such ships and cargo destroyed by Anglo-Rebel privateers, with a valuation thereof with interest from the date of capture, and demand payment in full from the British Government. Both resolutions, being objected to by Mr. Johnson of Maryland, lie over. The resolution offered on the 12th by Mr. Doolittle of Wisconsin and tabled, relating to taxation on sales and an extra tax of 25 per cent. on railroad fares, was taken from the table after some debate, and referred. A resolution (Mr. Reverdy Johnson of Maryland) was adopted that the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing an act of Congress, of March 31, 1801, entitled an act to remove the United States Arsenal from St. Louis and to provide for the sale of the lands on which it is located. The joint resolution offered on the 12th in relation to Great Britain of the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senate then went into executive session.

In the House, a bill (Mr. Wilson, Iowa) was reported and passed so amending the act of July 17, 1862, to define the rank and compensation of officers in the army, as to say that any alien of twenty-one years and upward who shall have served in the volunteer or regular service of the army and been honorably discharged, may become a citizen without any previous declaration, and shall be entitled to receive more than one year's residence. Bills making appropriations for diplomatic and consular purposes were referred. A resolution (Mr. Brooks, N. Y.) was passed, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs inquire into the expediency of providing by treaty or otherwise for the protection of our Canadian and provincial frontier from murder, arson, and burglary on the pretence of rebel invasion. A bill, discussed at length but not passed, was reported from the Military Committee and passed 68 to 59, providing that all white citizens who were Brigadier-Generals or above in the service of the United States who, on the 15th of February, 1865, shall not be in the performance of active service corresponding to their respective grades of rank, and who shall not have been in such service for a like term or terms three months continuously prior to that date, shall then be dismissed from the service, with the rule of right to all emoluments, or allowances of such grades as officers so dropped. Any officer who shall be dismissed under the provisions of this section shall be filled by the appointment of some other officer. But no officer is to be appointed to the foregoing section when the appointment would have been occasioned by wounds received, or disability incurred in the line of duty while in the military service, or by his being a prisoner of war in the hands of the enemy. The provisions of this bill apply to General of volunteers, or Brigadier-General of volunteers, who shall not be in the performance of active service under the authority given in section four of the act approved July 4, 1864, for the organization and employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property." The bill was opposed by those who think that so do arouse from the rolls, shall not thereby be disqualified from receiving the full pay, allowances, etc., to be remitted to his position and duty as an officer of the regular army. The House then went into committee on the purchase or construction of six steam revenue cutters on the Lakes and appropriated $600,000 to carry out the object of dollars. The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill (Mr. Stevens, Pa.) to amend the Bureau of Illinois in the chair. Mr. Brooks addressed the Committee in favor of the bill. The House then at a late hour dinner to negotiate with the South.

December 15:

In the Senate, a resolution (Mr. Sumner, Mass.) was adopted that the President be requested to communicate information concerning the arrangement between the United States and Great Britain relative to the naval force to be maintained on the Lakes. A petition from officers of the army for additional pay for the period of the war was referred. A resolution (Mr. Lane, Kansas) was adopted that the Secretary of War inform the Senate if he has instructed to inquire as to the truth of the alleged charges that the contracts for supplying the army are in the management of the Government in the navy-yards, Quartermaster's and Commissary Departments, and if so, what steps for the exclusion of loyal men, with preference to persons who are Democrats. The bill (Mr. Trumbull, Ill.) passed on the 14th, but then objected to, in reference to the organization of the Supreme Court of the United States, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The resolution (Mr. Wilson, Mass.) directing the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the act of Congress of March 3, 1797, entitled "An Act to more effectually provide for the National Defense by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States, and the several acts amendatory thereof," so far as relates to the enrollment of all male citizens between the ages of 18 and 45, resident in the several States, and to provide more to color, and also to submit such other provisions as may be necessary to organize the militia system of the United States, and report by bill or otherwise. At a late hour the Senate went into the consideration of executive business. A resolution (Mr. Anthony, R. I.) was adopted instructing the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia to inquire into the facts connected with the assault on Providence, July 10, 1861, by the Confederate forces on the 10th.

In the House, a resolution (Mr. Holman, Ind.) was referred, directing the Secretary of War to furnish a copy of the order issued by Gen. Sherman, in relation to the rebel on condition that they should be discharged when the exigencies of the service will permit. A bill, dated December, 1863, addressed to the Governor of Mississippi, directing him to call a convention of the people and which to abrogate and annul the ordinances thereof, was passed and have been applied to all other States. A bill to amend the act of March 3, 1863, relative to the writ of habeas corpus, was offered, requesting the President to communicate all information relating to the imprisonment of Lieutenant-Colonel Jacobs and Colonel Wolford. The resolution, adopted the 12th, was referred. A bill was passed providing for a special term of court for the District of Indiana. A resolution (Mr. Pendleton, O.) was adopted, directing an investigation of all the facts as to the practical working of the Quartermaster's and Subsistence Department, and to inquire into the actual condition of the present, and what measures should be passed to secure to them employment independent of pensions. A resolution (Mr. Cox, O.) was adopted that the Secretary of State communicate to the House all communications on file in his office, with reference to the difficulties upon the Northern borders, and which have not been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. A resolution (Mr. Goodrich, N. Y.) was referred, directing an inquiry as to the establishment of a New York Arsenal. On Monday, Mr. McClernand reported, from the Committee on Military Affairs, a bill for the better organization of the Quartermaster's Department. The Senate joint resolution was passed thanking Winslow and Cushing. A bill (Mr. Donnelly, Minn.) was referred, relieving all persons applying for the benefit of the exemption and homestead laws, from the draft who they had not deserted from the army, or resisted the draft, or rendered themselves in other being convicted or inducted, or discouraged sentiments, and providing that whenever such persons could be proved, the land should revert to the Government. Mr. Davis, of Maryland, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a resolution that Congress has a Constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the political policy of the United States, as well in the recognition of new Powers as in other matters, and it is the Constitutional duty of the President to repeat that policy, not into the domestic relations of any of the Powers of the world, but into the Congress of the United States, and the reporter of foreign policy by Congress is sufficiently proved by his vote in favor of recognizing the Confederacy, while pending and understatement, is not a fit topic of diplomatic cognizance. The resolution was adopted by a vote of yeas 80 to 61. Mr. Davis then asked to be relieved from service on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, saying that the Committee on Military Affairs would have more than it could attend to. The foreign correspondence with reference to the Mexican question was called for. Three quarters of a century ago we had a difficulty with this country, and that difficulty was settled by arbitration, as proceeded. The very same objections and appeals were made then as now. Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, Mr. Wilson, Mass., and pressed upon Jefferson, then Secretary of State, and he called attention to the facts resulting them from the life of Jefferson. Genet said Jefferson had discussed a friendly proposition with Genet had brought from his own nation, and said it ought not to be adopted without consulting Congress. Genet having got Jefferson stopped him, Jefferson stopped him, and explained the position of our Government, saying, "that all these matters belonged to the Executive Department, even if Congress were in session they could not be referred to it." Genet asked "if Congress was the sovereign?" and Jefferson said "No," and that Congress was sovereign only in making laws, the Executive in executing, and the Judiciary in construing them. Said Genet, "Congress binds us by treaties, and these shore-spruce," Jefferson said, "No, there are very few cases arising out of treaties of which Congress can take notice." Genet was entitled. We have no treaty stipulations which extend as far as that. He could not see any thing more mischievous than for Congress to pass a resolution. By it we should only deny a constituent power on the part of the Executive, and destroy the harmony of our Government by the division of power. In the course of the debate the House limited its action to the single question before the table. Mr. Chandler, of Pennsylvania, said that no stones that he had failed to see the least analogy between the position of the two gentlemen from Maine. Jefferson very properly told Genet that Congress had no right to interfere with treaty stipulations existing, by the Constitution, are the supreme law of the land. This is the only question before the country. He could not see that it had any bearing on the question before them. The House refused to accept Mr. Davis from further service on the Committee on Foreign Affairs. A bill (Mr. Ashley, O.) was introduced, and referred to be printed, to guarantee to certain States, enforced or overthrown by rebellion, a republican form of government. Mr. Ashley gave notice that on the 6th of January next he would call up the bill. Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, said that the object of the bill was to declare that the United States will guarantee to the States, the Constitutional amendment for the abolition of slavery throughout their limits, and that he would demand a vote upon the resolution the Monday following. A bill was passed making appropriations for invalid and other pensions, and the bill making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular establishments, the joint resolution, giving the true construction and meaning to so much of the Internal Revenue Act as relates to the tax on bonds and cigars, and in addition to the above, passed a bill providing that, in calculating the time of service required by the twenty-first section of the act entitled: "An act increasing the responsibility of officers in the army, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1862, for the withdrawal of goods from any public store, and general warehouse for exportation to foreign countries, or transhipment to any port of the border or waterways of the United States, if such exportation or transhipment of any goods shall enter for the whole or in part of the duties imposed by law, shall have been prevented by reason of any order of the President of the United States, the time during which such exportation or transhipment of such goods shall have been so prevented, or as aforesaid, shall be excluded from the said computation. The House adjourned till the 19th.

December 16:

In the Senate, a bill (Mr. Grimes, Iowa) was referred, to create the rank of Vice-Admiral in the navy. A resolution (Mr. D. Wilde, Wis.) was referred, authorizing the President to issue letters of marque to citizens, or to such thereof as might be necessary to build fortifications and floating batteries for the protection of lakes and harbors against attacks of piratical and hostile expeditions organized in the British provinces for enemies of the United States. An interesting debate followed the introduction of the resolution (Mr. Wilson, Mass.) to amend the act of July 17, 1862, so as to authorize the enrolling of the colored men into the militia. Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, said he was not in favor of arming the blacks, and though we ought never to cease to claim our rights, he would be willing to see the question settled until we had subdued the rebellion. A bill (Mr. Lane, Kansas) was referred, authorizing the people of Colorado to form a State government. A bill (Mr. Henderson, Mo.) was referred to authorize the Secretary of War to suspend or suspended for military purposes. A joint resolution (Mr. Henderson) was introduced to provide against the probable invasion of Missouri by the rebels. Mr. Sumner's bill to improve the organization for carrying the mails on account of color was passed 31 to 5.

In the House, a bill was introduced to amend the Revenue laws by changing the time for levying the tax on tobacco. Mr. Dawes, of Massachusetts, introduced the resolution laid on the table on the 15th, declaring the right of Congress to shape the foreign policy of the United States. It was passed. Mr. Stevens, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back to the effect that the act to provide internal revenue for the support of the Government, established June 30, 1864, be amended in the fifty-fifth section by striking out the word "February" wherever it occurs, and inserting in lieu thereof "January" after the second section was passed. In addition to this duty now imposed by law, all spirits of domestic production held for sale on the 1st of January, 1865, shall be subject to a duty of fifty cents per gallon. The clause levying an additional tax was struck out. The bill, thus altered, was passed. The House went into Committee of the Whole, when Mr. Spaulding, of Ohio, spoke of the President's Message, indorsing its principles in regard to finance.

SHERMAN'S NEW CAMPAIGN.

That Sherman acted wisely in committing to Thomas the campaign in Tennessee, Hood's recent crushing defeat amply testifies. As to the wisdom of his own operations in attempting a march across three hundred miles of the enemy's country—that is demonstrated by his completely successful result. Sherman has reached Savannah, and, by the capture of Fort M'Allister on the 13th, has succeeded in establishing communication between his army and Dahlgren's fleet. In a dispatch, dated on the evening of that day, he declares that his army is in splendid condition and "rejoicing in any thing." He has not lost a wagon on the trip, but he has destroyed over two hundred miles of rails, and consumed stores which were essential to the Confederate armies. He has gathered in a large supply of negroes, mules, horses, etc., and has been more in better condition than when he set out. He has invested Savannah, which, according to all reports, has a garrison of 15,000, and a population of 25,000. The defense of Savannah has been entrusted to General Hardee.

ADMIRAL FORTER'S FLEET.

On the 13th there was a grand naval and military pavilion, under the command respectively of Admiral Porter and General Butler, left Hampton Roads for Wilmington. The fleet consists of 60 vessels, and is composed of the most formidable ships in the navy. Many of these are iron-clads. Upward of a hundred transports accompany the expedition. There is no part of the world that boats provided with torpedo machines. The Shawsheen, the largest of these torpedo-boats, is about 200 feet, and altogether the fleet mans 820 guns. General Weitzel accompanies General Butler. The expedition probably reached New Inlet on the 16th. The recent destruction of the Wilmington Railroad was intended to prevent General Lee from transporting troops rapidly to the point of attack.

CO-OPERATIVE EXPEDITIONS.

Toward the close of December Gen. Canby sent out expeditions from Vicksburg and Baton Rouge to co-operate with Sherman. The expedition from Baton Rouge, consisting of 2000 cavalry under E. D. Osterad, returned December 4. On the fifth this column, after having moved on Jackson, attacked and destroyed the Big Black Bridge on the Mississippi Central Railroad. The movement cut Hood off from large quantities of supplies and forces which had been accumulated at Jackson. Thirty miles of the track were destroyed, including culverts, and 3000 bales of cotton. The column from Baton Rouge, under General Davidson, advanced in the direction of Mobile.

A NEW DRAFT.

A call has been made for three hundred thousand more men, to supply deficiencies occasioned by large credits allowed.

NEWS ITEMS.

One Minister to France, the Hon. William L. Dayton, died December 1, of apoplexy, while on a visit to the Hôtel du Louvre, in Paris.

Burbridge, according to Stoneman's command, has captured Bristol, in Brockinbridge's rear, on the Virginia and East Tennessee Railroad. He then destroyed the railroad and took Abingdon. It was expected by the rebels that Saltville would be attacked.

Hood's official report of the battle of Franklin claims a victory, and reports 4500 killed and wounded. Among the loss of rank Major-General Cleburne was killed, and Major-General Adams and Brigadier-General Gordon wounded. Brigadier-General Gordon captured.

A CHRISTMAS BALLAD.

In the far-off Polar seas,
Far beyond the Hebrides,
Where the icebergs, towering high,
Seem to pierce the wintry sky,
And the fur-clad Esquimaux
Glide in sledges o'er the snow,
Dwells St. Nick, a merry wight,
Patron saint of Christmas night.

Solid walls of massive ice,
Bearing many a quaint device,
Flanked by graceful turrets twain,
Clear as clearest porcelain,
Rearing at a lofty height
Christ's pure cross in simple white,
Carven with surpassing art
From an iceberg's crystal heart.

Here St. Nick, in royal state,
Dwells until December late
Clips the days at either end,
And the nights each way extend;
Then with his attendant sprites
Scours the earth on wintry nights,
Bringing back in well-filled hands
Children's gifts from many lands.

Here are whistles, toys, and toys,
Meant to gladden little boys;
Skates and sleds that soon will glide
O'er the ice or steep hill-side.
Here are dolls with flaxen curls,
Sure to charm the little girls;
Christmas books, with pictures gay,
For this welcome holiday.

In the court the reindeer wait;
Filled the sledge with costly freight.
As the first faint shadow falls
Promptly from his icy halls
Steps St. Nick, and grasps the rein:
Straight his coursers scour the plain,
And afar, in measured time,
Sounds the sleigh-bells' silver chime.

Like an arrow from the bow
Speed the reindeer o'er the snow.
Onward! Now the loaded sleigh
Skirts the shores of Hudson's Bay.
Onward, till the stunted tree*
Gains a loftier majesty,
And the curling smoke-wreaths rise
Under low chimney skies.

Built upon a hill-side steep
Lies a city wrapt in sleep.
Up and down the lonely street
Sleepy watchmen pace their beat.
Little boots Santa Claus:
Not for him are human laws.
With a hop he leaves the ground,
Scales the chimney at a bound.

Five small stockings hang below,
Five small stockings in a row.
From his pocket blithe St. Nick
Fills the waiting stockings quick:
Some with sweetmeats, some with toys,
Gifts for girls, and gifts for boys;
Mounts the chimney like a bird,
And the bells are once more heard.

Santa Claus! Good Christmas Saint!
In whose heart no selfish taint
Findeth place, some homes there be
Where no stockings wait for thee—
Homes where sad young faces wear
Painful marks of Want and Care,
And the Christmas morning brings
No fair hopes of better things.

Can you not some crumbs bestow
On these children steeped in woe;
Steal a single lock of care
Which their sad young faces wear;
From your overflowing store
Give to them whose hearts are sore?
No sad eyes should greet the morn
When the infant Christ was born.

GENERAL WARREN'S RAID.

One of the most successful expeditions against General LEE'S communications was that undertaken recently by General WARREN in his raid on the Weldon Railroad, which we illustrate on pages 836 and 837. The Fifth Corps, accompanied by MOTT'S Division of the Second and GREGG'S Cavalry, made up the attacking force which set out from the left, 7, having been previously withdrawn from the lines around Petersburg and massed near the Avery House. In the midst of a driving rain, which continued all day and the next night, WARREN moved rapidly down the Jerusalem Road to the Nottaway River, which he crossed by means of a pontoon at Freeman's Bridge. The next day, leaving a cavalry guard at the crossing, and posting pickets on flanks by cavalry, he continued his march through Sussex Court House, east of the railroad, toward Nottoway Bridge. This point was reported by the enemy's cavalry, which was steadily driven back. The bridge was reached at noon and destroyed. It was 200 feet long, and spanned the Nottoway River. The raiding column was now secure against any attack from Petersburg, and completely annihilated the railroad south of the bridge for a distance of eight miles. The track was lifted up, ties and rails together, as shown in one of our sketches, and heaped in piles and burned. The bonfire, in the darkness of the night, presented a brilliant spectacle. The rain had ceased, and it was now bitter cold, and this fact did not diminish the zest of the soldiers for making bonfires. Jarret's Dépôt was burned early in the morning of the 9th, and the work of destruction continued thence southward. During the day two bridges—each 60 feet long—were burned, and at night WARREN had reached Bellfield Station, near the Meherrin River. Twenty miles of the railroad had been completely destroyed, and no opposition had been encountered. A reconnoissance toward Hicksford on the river having developed the fact that the enemy was strongly posted at that point, with considerable artillery, WARREN turned northward on the 10th. On the return the town of Sussex Court House was burned in retaliation for the murder of several of our soldiers by the enemy at that point. A large number of contrabands accompanied the returning column.

In estimating the value of General WARREN'S raid it must be remembered that LEE had previously contrived to convey a large amount of supplies to his army by means of the Boydton plank-road, which connected the Southside Railroad with the point where the Weldon had been interrupted. He had also nearly completed a branch railroad from Stony Creek Station to the Southside Road. The portion of the railroad destroyed by WARREN is south of Stony Creek Station, and until the road is repaired LEE is entirely cut off from eastern North Carolina, and from the region of Virginia east of the Weldon Road. This raid will be of great service to General GRANT; its work was done in three days, and it was effected with the loss of less than one hundred men. The great success of the expedition was due to General WARREN'S skill, and to his personal superintendence at every point. His high spirit revealed itself with glory, and especially General CRAWFORD'S Division, which led the advance.

CAPTURE OF THE "ARMSTRONG."

WE give on page 837 an illustration of the chase and capture of the blockade-runner Armstrong, and our gun-boats. She was captured 60 instant, eighty miles off Wilmington, by the steamer R. R. Cuyler, Machigonne, and Gettysburg, after an exciting chase of eight hours, during which nearly one hundred shot and shell were fired. Most of the shells striking her on the starboard quarter, then bursting and setting her on fire. The fire was extinguished before any serious damage was done. The Armstrong is very fast, and averages fourteen miles per hour. She is an iron-side steamer of 700 tons burden. She was on her first trip from Wilmington, and was laden with cotton.

MARGARET MILLER.

A STORY IN NINE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER IV.

IT was late that night when the little steamer came to her moorings. Twice she got aground, with the prospect of waiting for the returning tide; but "All hands forward!" and she slid over the shoals in triumph. Vainly we urged Robert to disregard the call, and avoid the misty night-air by remaining in the cabin. He could not be prevailed upon while ladies were assisting to lighten the boat. Considerations of need and increased thoughtlessness next morning, accompanied with great weariness and weakness.

Neither of us went to bed at last; for, with broken rest and solicitude, I was almost as much exhausted as my brother.

Colonel Hamilton came at ten to give Robert another taste of the pine-woods—"Perhaps the last," he said—and was surprised to find him so ill.

"But you'll be all right again in a day or two," he said, encouragingly. "Every convalescent has 'pull-backs,' to teach him prudence perhaps."

"Or patience," my brother responded, in a tone in which grief and gentleness were pain fully apparent.

"Some of us have need to be taught that, my dear fellow, but not you. I had never strength to endure suffering, physical or mental, for a moment without murmuring."

Colonel Hamilton's voice was almost as soft as my brother's.

"I shall come to you again directly after dinner," he said, as he turned to leave the room. "Your sister will need a nurse."

"I have been trying to prevail upon her to take either rest or a ride this morning," Robert said.

"My carriage is at the door, and I would gladly accompany her to another of my flowering plantations. Possibly I might persuade her bracelet lost on that other very unfortunate excursion," he added, turning to me.

"Oh, no! I had left the bracelet with which I encircled my bouquet; but never having mentioned the circumstance, you could not understand how the Colonel should have learned the fact. There was not a ray of intelligence in the glance which met my look of entreaty, only a quiet waiting for a decision of the question of the ride.

"I am too fatigued to ride this morning, but the siesta is a temptation to which I will yield willingly."

Robert and I dined together in the full enjoyment of dressing-gown and slippers. He was more comfortable than in the morning, only a spot with comparative ease, though the cherry-like glow of his cheeks mocked the fainter bloom of health. While we were lingering over our coffee the Colonel came to fulfill his promise.

"Guiltless of cigar," my brother said, smiling him a welcome, and pointing to the box he seated at the same time.

"Guiltless of coffee and bananas also," he returned, nodding significantly at our dessert.

"So much the better. These bananas came by the last boat from Key West, and are very fine."

Jimmy was ordered to bring an extra cup and plate. I played hostess until a second cup of coffee was offered and declined, then retired.

A long, unbroken slumber, a sweet consequent of the last night's nervous wakefulness, ensued. The last thing I heard was the low, indistinct sound of the gentlemen's voices in the adjoining apartment. When I awoke the sun was far down in the west. Listening, I heard no sound in the adjoining room, and wondered whether he had not gone below. A few minutes sufficed for my toilet; then raising the latch softly, I entered, and found him sleeping upon the sofa, the Colonel still sitting beside him, and holding his hand as tenderly as a woman.

"I talked your brother to sleep," he said, apologetically.

"He is no worse, I hope?"

"Oh no! only a little fatigued. A day or two of rest will bring him up again, I think."

"I am afraid I have kept you from your hospitals for. I am very much obliged to you for your care of my brother."

"You will accept nothing for yourself then?"

"Nothing."

He was gone, and I sat down in the seat he had just deserted. My brother slept still, though disturbedly. Changes, like crowding thoughts, passed over his countenance so rapidly as to alarm me. He whispered inarticulately at first; then, his features calming down to a smile, he uttered, distinctly, "Margaret, Margaret, you promise me never to lose sight of her;" and held his breath like one listening for a reply.

I answered—"Never!" thinking he might be dreaming of home and Aunt Hannah.

"God bless you, my good friend!" was his earnest response. So earnest it awoke him! His eyes fastened upon me inquiringly, and he smiled.

"I thought Hamilton was with me, Margy!"

"He has just left you," I replied. "I slept the whole afternoon, and he sat with you until I came."

"He is one of the kindest of men, Margy?"

"Every one appears to think so, Robert."

"And why do you not like him?"

"I accord him all the good qualities, but noble qualities should not blind one to radical defects."

"What are the faults you discover in him?"

"The chief of all—disloyalty!"

The next morning we were aroused by the eagle-horn blowing vigorously for the Hillsboro ferry-man. It seemed to say—"Hasten up! I bring you news, great news for the glorious cause." Every one in the garrison knew the language of Jerry Dining's horn when it neared the river; and there was a general rush for the ferry.

"What next?" I asked myself, as the shouts of the men and boys penetrated to the heart of the town. "Has Fort Pickens so soon followed Sumter, or another cowardly Twiggs delivered the arsenals and forts of another State into the hands of rebels and traitors?"

Neither; but the Secretary of Massachusetts men had collected the streets of Baltimore on the anniversary of the battle of Lexington. For this, bonfires were lighted and the crowd huzzaed.

Robert was unable to go to the ferry, and Colonel Hamilton was the excitement and obullition. Maryland had shown herself worthy of a place in the Southern Constellation. Massachusetts and the accredited Butler were on their way South; South Carolina and the heroic Maxey Gregg were on their way North; there was fun afoot; one could see for we was all the South wanted!

Good of heavens! what an hour, when the sons of patriots strike at their country's flag, and brothers delight in brothers' blood! Only a few days ago Colonel Hamilton, as though still we were not so very fine a thing to be jubilant over after all.

Colonel Hamilton was not at table. Mrs. Harris, who seldom left her room in the morning, was all animation, and said she would go home with the next steamer, and took her negroes would hear about the war and run away if they got a chance. Miss Kittie tossed her mirth, and spoke in a tone subdued and quiet.

We all met at dinner, when the war-news was the topic of conversation. Robert and I remained silent until a lady whom I disliked said, maliciously, I fancied: "We are going to have more speeches at the Court House to-night, Miss Miller, to rouse up the people. Will you go and listen?"

"Thank you, no, Madam! It is not necessary to go abroad to hear treason nowadays."

Every one in the table was upon me. I was certain. I looked only at Robert, who sat as undisturbed as though I had simply said "No" to the offer of more tea.

"Who are to be the speakers?" Miss Kittie asked, more in the tone of one who would break a disagreeable silence than one who cares for information.

"Madam Rumor is not communicative on that point," she replied, gayly. "With strictest inquiry I could only learn that our friend Colonel Hamilton here would not be one of them, and that the new preacher, whose secession views have already been somewhat elaborated, would be one. How do you think the Colonel will construe your remark, Miss Miller?"

I was indignant, but managed to smother both anger and contempt so as to reply haughtily and coolly:

"It is of no consequence to me, Madam, how he construes it. If it suit him, he can accept it; if not, he is at liberty to reject it."

The gentlemen at the table were speaking sat obliquely opposite me. There was neither frown nor scowl on his face, such as I often noticed when he was displeased. On the contrary, I thought he looked amused, and it annoyed me.

Miss Kittie and I went out on the upper piazza after dinner, while the gentlemen were smoking below.

"I don't understand a thing what all this quarrel is about," she said, sadly. "If the South is in the wrong I don't wish to know, for I am a Southerner. But I don't see, my love, why individuals need indulge in personal spite, like that impertinent old thing at table. I can not help liking you just as well as though you had been born in my grandfather Gaisden's house instead of my grandfather Harris's; and I wish you and your brother would go home with us to Mississippi."

"Bless her fine Kittie Harris!" exclaimed a voice before I had time to reply to her warm-hearted words, and Colonel Hamilton stood near us, knocking the ashes from his cigar. "Those are my sentiments, well expressed. We have too many haters on our side, and I have no reason to doubt the feeling is most heartily reciprocated."

"I will answer for the North, Sir," I returned, warmly. "The North feels no hatred against the South. She loves our common country, and is deeply determined to stand by it, or if not suffer it to be overthrown, even though compelled to crush its foes."

"You speak very warmly, Miss Margy."

"I speak as I feel, then. When the troops of the United States can, if necessity require, march from Maine to Texas, and from Texas to Maine again peaceably, I shall be able to speak more calmly and coolly."

"A lady ought at all times to be safe in speaking her sentiments freely and openly. But every nation has its fanatics and its unprincipled men, who scruple at nothing in a crisis like this. For your brother's sake, then, I beg you to be guarded, Miss Miller."

"Do not think, Sir, my brother would seek safety by infidelity to his country. If he could be so base I should disown him."

He bowed and retired. Miss Kittie and I were again alone, and fell to speculating on the probabilities of a blockade, and whether Tampa was of sufficient importance to be put in the catalogue of Southern ports. Kittie had commenced the packing of their trunks, that they might be ready at a minute's warning when the next steamer was signaled. It was not the case day, and Kittie begged we would accompany them down the Bay.

While we were talking about it, and planning a correspondence, Robert came with a letter for me. I knew, instantly, something to look of anxiety on his face, though masked with a smile.

"A letter for you from New York, Margy. I was expecting one myself, but it did not come."

I read and read my mine, then, as a sort of communion, I said, soothingly: "It is from a mutual friend, and gives account of a great demonstration at Union Square."

I began to read, and when I came to where the battle-rent flag of Sumter was taken amidst deafening cheers to the bronze statue and placed in the hand of the "Father of his Country" by the very same man who had nailed it to the mast amidst the storm of rebel shot and shell, my brother's feelings overcame him, and he wept like a child. Kittie's eyes moistened also; but it was but one of my moments of weakness. Had I been a man I would have made a speech then and there, for I felt strong enough for martyrdom.

Colonel Hamilton's carriage stood at the door. It was not long before we heard his well-known step, firm and equal, though soft as a woman's. He came, looked inquiringly from one to another, as though suddenly checked in what he wished to say, and uncertain whether he might not be an intruder.

"Read this," I said, holding out the open letter by a sudden impulse, "and see how loyal men and women still love their country."

He took it without a word, sat down upon one of the vacant seats, and read it carefully from beginning to end. Then he hastily passed over his eyes, as though they were misty; but when he returned the letter without a single remark there was no trace of feeling whatever.

"I came to invite you for a short drive this evening—positively the last," he said, turning to Robert. "I see you ask for a day's leaving town to-morrow."

"To-morrow will be a very unlucky day for us then," returned my brother.

"Don't go to-morrow, Colonel Hamilton," interposed Kittie. "I want you to see the Bay with us. I think it will be easier to say good-by there than here. Please stay just one day more."

I would gladly be persuaded, Miss Kittie, but my letters to-day are urgent, and I have never before felt reluctance in leaving Tampa."

I brought my brother's palmetto and dusted him when he decided to ride, then went with Kittie to sit with her mother until tea.

Early that night the citizens began to gather around the Court House. We heard loud cheering for Beauregard and the Baltimore boys; cheering again for South Carolina and Maxey Gregg; then a vociferous call for Colonel Hamilton.

He was smoking on the lower piazza, but at the call arose and walked leisurely toward the assembled crowd. Not long after we heard his voice in earnest declamation, though unable to distinguish what he said. That it was satisfactory, however, was clearly demonstrated by the noisy shouts that succeeded, and the man stood publicly committed to the cause I hated.

Robert fell into parting more than I anticipated. I had never seen him so overcome since the day we left home. I left him and the Colonel together, and ran away to Kittie's room, for their grief was sympathetic. More than half an hour elapsed before the latter came to the door of Mrs. Harris's room to say farewell. He offered me his hand a second time, and said, "Remember me always as your brother's friend and yours, Miss Margy." The touch of his hand for a moment became a pressure, and he was gone.

I did not return to Robert until he sent for me; then the name of his friend was broached by neither of us. We talked of Kittie, however; he regarding that he felt unable to accompany the little party from the hotel to the steamer, and insisting that I should go without him. All day we waited in momentary expectation of the signal which would take away another friend whom we had found in that far Southern land. It was nearly nightfall when it came at last.

The prospect of a moonlight excursion could not induce me to leave Robert, who had been out of spirits all day. In vain Miss Kittie laughed, and tried to say gay things as usual to both of us—recollective of the times we would have when we came "to make that visit to the old plantation." She broke down in the midst, and burst into a flood of weeping. We put our arms around her, and held her fast until Chris came the second time to take her away.

"I will write to you every mail," she said; "every single mail! Don't forget me."

We stood on the piazza waving the departing carriage until it was out of sight; then hand in hand went back to our own rooms, feeling more than ever that we were alone—"strangers in a strange land."

A letter from Colonel Hamilton came the next week, remarked Tullahassee. I will not copy it, but from its cheering influence on Robert inferred it was the bearer of agreeable tidings. The Colonel's name seldom passed between us. At sometimes wished Robert would speak of him, knowing how much he must love him.

But the first thing that really enlivened us was Miss Kittie's journal, sent back from New Orleans. It was a document calculated to excite heart-shadows, like its fair originator; and we laughed as heartily over "Kittie's three days' adventure at sea" as we had often done over her gayety on land. Chris's sea-sickness, and her mother's anxiety to get home before the darkeys heard the war-news, were worthy of a Dickens.

Our friends had been gone a month, and we were learning to live without them, when Robert was able, in the morning, lounging on the piazzas and reading the news at evening. Our kind host and hostess were relieved from all their exertions for our comfort and happiness, no less in their attempts to shield from petty annoyances than by efforts to give positive pleasure. We came to regard the war as a fixed fact, our separation from home complete. Day after day we had heard the silver cords of the Stars and Union parting, and thought sorrowfully of the deeds of evil fathers; of their trail and contagion; their hopes and prayers, while laying the foundation of their glorious work.

We thought again of the blessed fruits of that Union; of the peace, prosperity, and happiness which had flowed in like a river, until tyrants grew pale before the majesty of the free republic, ready to match its strength with giants of the Old World. We thought, too, of those brave men who had stood side by side in the Senate-Chamber and on the battle-field while that nation was walking from glory to glory—grand men, who grown to mortal foes; and more sorrowfully still we thought of brothers of the same parents and heart-kindred who had become mortal foes in their enmity than the sons of strangers. Then the mocking shouts, already heard in the distance from loud-mouthed despots, rang in our ears, until I could have fallen on my knees in all humility, and begged our misguided brethren to return to our father's house.

Such thoughts were the result of calm, undisturbed reflection. But let the subject matter be spoken again to assert the principle, or palliate the offense of those same erring men, and gentle thoughts would have taken wing in a moment: we would have reasserted "No truce with traitors; no concession nor compromise; no oil on the bitter waters of strife; justice is inflexible, and demands the uttermost farthing."

CHAPTER V.

I HAVE come now to the saddest leaf of my record. After lingering over trifling incidents to keep the great event as far away as possible, it must be met here again in imagination as it had to be met first in terrible reality. Months and years of entrancing love and happiness the pang. I have learned to think of other loved and lost ones with a sort of pensive pleasure; but Robert's memory is keen, and weaves with tears. Never until death closes the gates of life behind me also shall I cease to lament thee, O my brother!

Brief as the final struggle of his existence will be my task in the closing life. I will be grateful to linger over. I thought him better, at least no worse, and so wrote to Kittie on the very morning of his death. Knowing well that his gentle, invalid ways, with his habitual cough, sometimes better, sometimes worse, with his pallid weakness and weariness, made me interpret life to the ever-present danger. Moreover, from the first I had fully believed the climate of Tullahassee would effect an ultimate cure. That he knew better, and saw the event not far distant, I know now from the testimony of his own words, the last he penned:

"The time is at hand when I shall have to claim the fulfillment of your promise. I have felt a single doubt of your ability to the sacred trust imposed on you—not one. I am sure there is there uncertain time, and I shall not call it untimely. I have nothing to repeat, nothing further to add. Do not try to console Margy; she will be brave, and bid me pass 'to God and home.'

Never! I can not tell her, nor would it avail to lighten the stroke. You can say, when it is all over, how much more I have suffered for her than for myself. My dear Colonel, what should I have done without you? I thank Heaven humbly for giving me such a friend. Your two letters are sealed carefully, and marked—to be returned. Take my dying love and blessing."

Little did I think when placing the writing materials before him what he was about to write, or that the precious words would ever be returned to me, to be read, wept over, and preserved among my most treasured treasures.

We had spoken the day previous of going with the Mayor to fish for sheep-head in the Hillsboro. He came for us; but Robert complained of illness and indisposition to make the effort. The Mayor did not urge him, but promised a splendid day for dinner.

After he was gone Robert lay upon the sofa and slept until noon; awoke with a sense of chilliness, although it was warm in a tropical climate. I wrapped him in blankets, and sent for a physician without finding much alarm. When he came, he was sleeping again very heavily. He examined his pulse, felt of his brow, and inquired if he had slept as much the preceding night. I thought so. He ordered warm balm tea to promote perspiration, and said he would call again in the evening. It would be better not to disturb him.

Dinner was sent up. I waited for him, and sat down after hour before I knew much he would be refreshed by such quiet sleep. Not a shadow of suspicion crossed my mind. Without a murmur, as though mind and body were alike steeped in repose, until almost nightfall, when his eyes unclosed and fastened on me inquiringly. How bright they looked in their fixed, earnest gaze!

"What a nice long sleep you have had, Robert! Do you feel better for it?"

He would have spoken, but began to cough, and expectorated a little blood. At the same time putting his handkerchief to his lips. He could not control the flow. The crimson stream bought half a dozen persons to the door. Robert's hand grasped mine convulsively, his head drooped on my shoulder, while the red tide was pouring fast from the seat of life.

"Don't touch him! I exclaimed when they would have removed him—"don't touch him, unless you can save him!"

No mortal could do that. Long before the blood ceased it was over. Margy turned bewildered and his breath departed.

Of the moments I do not know. Who unclasped his hand from mine, took his head from my shoulder, or wiped his red lips, I never knew. Memory did it tenderly. I have no doubt, and removed my own blood-stained dress, and laid me upon the bed where I found myself with returning consciousness.

I had forgotten nothing. The last thread memory dropped was the first one she picked up. I thought I had only fainted for a few minutes.

"Take me to my brother again. I feel better now."

"Are you strong enough?" asked kind Mrs. Thomson. "I am afraid you are ill."

I was resolute; and leaning on her arm reached the door of Robert's room. It was dark and quiet. She opened the shutters. The bed had been removed, but a low couch stood in its place, upon it lay my brother, dressed neatly in black. He bewildered.

"Is not this Thursday?" I inquired.

"Yesterday," she replied. "You have been ill, Miss Miller."

I was ill again, and would have fainted but for Mrs. Thomson's words.

"They wished to bury your brother this morning, but neither the Mayor nor your friend would consent to it."

"Bury my brother!" I exclaimed. "Oh, Mrs. Thomson! I am going to take Robert home."

In an agony of grief I threw myself upon the couch, pressed my cheek to his, and said:

"They shall not bury you, Robert, my poor brother! I will never leave you here alone. Never! We will go home together to Aunt Mary."

I heard smothered sobs. Some one raised me gently but firmly from the couch and carried me back to my own room. My eyes were closed. I saw nothing, heard nothing, until Mrs. Thomson came and sat down by me again, took my hand, and said:

"Poor fatherless dear, poor Miss Margy! They shall not bury him."

With this assurance I must have slept.

The next morning she came to me early into my chamber. If it had been shining for the last three days I had not seen it. I tried to think what the sunshine was, but the thoughts would go no further than "Robert is dead!"

"Jimmy, Jimmy, Jimmy!" as Miss Kittie used to call him, brought up a bouquet with my breakfast, and waited for me to notice it.

"It is pretty, Jimmy, but I don't care for flowers any more.

"Mars'r Robert liked dem dar sort, Miss. Poor Mars'r Robert!

Jimmy had been my brother's waiter ever since my arrival, and I learned all his little likes and dislikes, even to his favorite flowers. I looked up, and saw the boy's eyes fixed sorrowfully on me. His mouth was half open, and he began to sing, with that plaintive inflection no Saxon tongue has ever caught,

"Dar'll be no more sorrow dar!
Dar'll be no more sorrow dar!
In Hebben above, what all is love,
Dar'll be no more sorrow dar!"

Burning drops were on my cheeks.

"Don't cry, Miss, don't! Mars'r Robert's done gone to dat dar 'appy Land."

"Don't see it, Jimmy! It is out of sight."

"Oh! dat's 'cause de cross, dey we find 'em sure, Miss."

The fountain of tears was opened. I took the flowers and went into Robert's room by myself. Some one had opened the shutters, and let in the sweet morning air and sunshine. There he lay, wearing the same smile still, the very semblance of life. Kneeling down beside him, I put the flowers in his hand, kissed his pale forehead and lips, and struggled to be calm. But the barriers were broken; the tide would gush forth.

"Oh, Robert! are you really smiling upon me? Tell me where you are now! Do you know I am all alone in the world since you left me? All gone: father, mother, George, Willie, and little Dobby. I can not live alone! Robert, come back for me!"

The piazza door suddenly unlocked, and some one entered the room. I could not be mistaken in this tall, manly figure even.

"Colonel Hamilton!"

He came near, put his hand upon my head, and was silent. I heard him weep.

"Colonel Hamilton, see what death has done?"

"Miss Margy, let me try to comfort you. It breaks my heart to hear you go on so. I promised Robert to be his friend after death brother to you; and I promise you now, here in his presence, that you shall never want a friend while I live."

I tried to thank him.

"Have you just arrived?"

"I have been here two days. Your brother's letter reached me on Wednesday morning. I set out without an hour's delay, and arrived Friday evening—too late."

"Did Robert send for you?"

"No, Miss Margy, but I wished to be with him at the last. Thank God, he needed no one but you!"

He took a letter from his pocket, quietly unfolded it, and read a portion of what I have before quoted:

"Do not try to come to me. Death has no terrors, and I have no fear. Love me better! Poor Margy! I can not tell her. When it is over, you can say how much I suffered for her. Oh, Colonel, be kind to her!"

He read no more, and was returning it to the envelope.

"Would you part with that, Colonel Hamilton? I have no letters of Robert's, except a few written while he was in college. We were not always together."

"You shall certainly have it if you wish," he replied. "Much as I prize it, your claim is before mine."

"I have no claim, Sir. I am willing to owe it to your generosity."

"Margy, have you eaten any breakfast?"

"I am not eat."

"I will ask Mrs. Thomson to send you a fresh piece of toast, and a cup of coffee. When you have taken it, I wish to speak to you again of your future home."

He led me to the door of my room, and said:

"I will come for you in half an hour." Mrs. Thomson came herself with the second tray of food.

"I know just how this you like your toast, and have brought it buttered it myself. It is nice, honey, and you will eat it when I have taken so much pains."

"I will try."

I ate it all, choking with every mouthful.

"You'll be better now," she said. "You've took nothing but drink for three days. Mr. Thomson shall shoot a bird for you to-morrow. I want to comfort your heart now, and dress you myself. Your hair is in a dreadful snarl."

I submitted as before.

"Do you care which of these dresses you put on?"

"No."

"The bombazine has crape folds. 'Tis the most suitable; and here's a collar and undersleeves to match. I hear the Colonel in the other room again. You'll soon be ready."

A light rap at the door was answered by Mrs. Thomson.

"Has she eaten?"

"Like a lamb."

"Thank you. Your husband has perfected every other arrangement. I must speak with Miss Miller now."

"Miss Margy," he said, taking my hand and leading me back into my brother's room. "I have to tell you of the last wish which Robert wished. In the first place, to be buried in a metallic coffin, which fortunately has been procured."

"I am not going to have him buried here, Sir. I will take him home!"

"Margy, listen!"

"By way of Key West."

"Margy, for seven or seven years, before we have another steamer. The blockade is effected."

"I will go across the country, then."

"It is utterly impossible. Listen to me, Miss Margy. If you wish to go home, I will procure you a passport, and you shall go to the line myself. When, as soon as the war-clouds break away, if I am still living, Lwill bring you your brother. Your promise on my honor as a man."

"I can not go away and leave him here, Colonel Hamilton."

"I have another proposition to make, one which Robert liked better on account of your feelings. Your mother you should remain in Florida until the close of the war. He made arrangements which I will communicate to you to-morrow. I never speak of the burial, which will have to take place to-day. Have you ever visited the cemetery?"

"I can not have him buried here; it will kill me! Oh, if it only would!"

I rose on this morning early, and selected the spot I liked best. Would you like to go and see it?"

"No, it don't matter much. Who would you like to have read the service?"

"Not that minister who abuses the North so. He should be buried without a prayer sooner."

"Very well! I do not like him either. But there is Dr. Branch, who is a Northerner and a good man too. He has been a preacher. I will send for him to do it. Now, Margy, go and rest. I will come for you again in an hour."

"Colonel Hamilton, do you say Robert is to be buried in an hour, and ask me to go away and rest? Can you be so cruel as not to leave him to me one day longer?"

"I would gladly grant all you ask, but it is impossible."

His decision alarmed me.

"I must stay here with him this morning, Colonel Hamilton! Go and leave me alone. You don't know what it is to be so utterly bereft."

"My poor child! I pity you."

"You can not help me. Leave me, and I will try to do what is right. Don't think me ungrateful.

He went away. I heard him pacing up and down the piazza a long time, while I sat trying to reduce my broken thoughts to order. "It is true," I said, "that I can not take him home?" Reason replied, "It is true. He must be laid here for a time, then his precious dust may be removed to mingle with kindred dust. It is you who should see it done, not a stranger."

I was gazing at Robert still when Mrs. Thomson's footstep announced another visitor. What wonder if my excited imagination for the moment believed it was he who counseled me to rise superior to weakness, or that I should have responded,

"For your sake, Robert, God helping me, I will do it!"

Kneeling down beside him, and clasping both his cold hands in mine, I prayed, as I had never prayed before, that Heaven would hear and help me in my weakness. What bitter, bitter cries burst from my heart in anguish! What groans, and sobbings, and tears, until other sobs mingled with mine; other forms were kneeling around me. Then some one arose silently, calm voices, entreating peace and consolation for the stranger's heart broken in their midst.

When the noise ceased some one led me away. Mrs. Thomson brought bonnet and mantle and tied them on me. Her husband came and said he would walk with the bearers, Colonel Hamilton would take us. The citizens, two and two, walked behind us. No coffin, the bearers bore it. A solitary carriage followed, until it came to a clump of cedars, and an open grave in one corner of the rural cemetery. There they left my poor brother.

THE CHRISTMAS SOLO.

THE Christmas of 1863 is so fresh in the memory of all who may read this little narrative that some of them will at once recall the incidents which, under the slight veil of a change of names of persons and places, I shall now relate.

In the rural district of this country, the Christmas holiday is not generally as much observed as in the city; but certainly the village of Buford numbered among its inhabitants so many city people that it retained many metropolitan customs, and one of these was the celebration of Christmas with a degree of fervor which could hardly be surpassed even in a Roman Catholic town of Italy.

Our church, the only one eastern in most Episcopal churches in country-places, depended chiefly for its vitality upon the assistance of ladies. A bachelor—Miss Story we mean—Ella Story, if I remember aright—played the little organ, and another lady —Matilda Ann Wragg—acted as choir leader and first soprano. This Matilda Ann Wragg was a daughter of Rev. Amos Wragg, who had been rector of the parish ever so long ago. He had been supernumerated some fifteen years since, and his only child, Matilda Ann, lived with him in his old house near the church, another parsonage having been built for the new incumbent, Mr. Watkins.

Matilda Ann Wragg had never been married—and as she had long since passed the bloom of youth she was necessarily an old maid. I must say, too, that she was not exactly like the typical old maid who are caricatured in ill-natured valentines; for she was tall, and gaunt, and skinny, and had bilious eyes and a sharp nose inclining to red. She had, moreover, a very glib tongue, with the use of which she was well acquainted, while I am afraid that she knew very well how to govern not only her body who came in her way. I well remember once applying to that lady a verse of Scripture slightly altered to suit the occasion: "Who hath babbling? who hath contention? who hath redness of eyes?" To which the reply naturally enough was, "Miss Matilda Ann Wragg."

In the choir Miss Wragg was complete despot. Not even the new minister, a weak, little man, fresh from a theological seminary, presumed to question her taste or judgment; and I verily believe he lived in constant fear that she should unfairly pounce upon him like a jaguar and marry him against his will. But, as I have said, she was very docile, and always referred all musical matters to the lady in question.

Miss Wragg, I should think, had been in years long gone by a fair singer, and now her voice had assumed a sharp, cutting tone that seemed to harmonize, however unpleasant the combination might have been, with her visage-like aspect. She was very fond of high tunes, and was never satisfied unless she had at least two F's and one G above the staff in every service. She was also strong enough on these high notes, but her middle register was so weak as to be almost inaudible. She never missed a Sunday at church, was very exemplary and devout in her deportment, and when she kneeled during prayer spread her skirts so that she took up nearly the whole organ-loft, leaving the other members of the choir pinned up against the margin, with room not even enough to breathe or cough; a measure would certainly have been out of the question.

Last Christmas our little church of St. Epaphroditus (see Philippians iv. 25) made unusual preparations for the celebration of the Blessed Day. The choir had procured a new anthem from New York—it was that in F flat major, by Popkins, Op. 127—and a High Church clergyman of Hoboken had sent a Te Deum, composed by himself, which contained an elaborate solo for Miss Wragg. Besides all this our rector, Mr. Watkins, had written a Christmas Carol, which the Sunday-school scholars were to sing in chorus to a tune resembling between a march and a bacchanalian song, after the fashion so much in vogue nowadays. The words were as follows:

CHRISTMAS CAROL.

On the glorious Christmas morn
Lord we sing to thee;
For our Saviour Christ was born
On this happy Christmas-day.
In the manger,
Heavenly stranger,
Then wert born
This blessed day.

When the Wise men from afar
Journeyed on their weary way,
Guided by a radiant star,
To the place where Jesus lay—
In the manger,
Where the stranger,
Where the infant
Jesus lay.

Men and angels thus adore
Him, to whom we sing and pray;
And to Him should we the more
Ceaseless love and homage pay.
To the stranger
In the manger
Who was born
On Christmas-day.

The choir at rehearsal were very cool to Miss Wragg. They looked, indeed, critical for some time, smouldering under the ashes of habitual and conventional respect, a genuine dissatisfaction against her ways of old and her voice had so palpably deteriorated that this dissatisfaction was but natural. Her solo in the Te Deum was painful to listen to. Sharp, shaky, and uncertain, her thin, querulous voice, sadly out of tune, grated upon the ears of the most unmusical; but she was firm in her determination to sing, and directed the rehearsals with more than her usual abrupt severity. Perhaps she was aware that she was not the less used to with pleasure, and that her powers were failing.

The members of the choir finally decided that she must be got rid of; but who was to tell the cat? Miss Ella Snow, as the organist and as one entitled to have some little authority, was at last persuaded to suggest, in a most humble way:

"Miss Wragg, don't you think it would be better for Miss Johnson or the tenor to take the solo?"

Miss Wragg darted a sudden suspicious glance around the choir, and the guilty singers—for they were all in the conspiracy—shrank up closer to the margin of the organ-loft, as if expecting a biting reply or an abrupt dissent; but they were almost touched to note that the next moment the features of the soprano assumed an expression of real pain as she timidly replied:

"It's written for the soprano, Miss Snow. I think I had better try it."

The tenor here blurted out that Miss Wragg ought to let Miss Johnson sing it, for she at least knew how to sing it. But the lady took no such mark; but the other members of the choir were emboldened by it, and the tenor himself said, rather more confidently, that, in fact, Miss Wragg's voice was suffering with her severe cold perhaps it would be better, after all, for Miss Johnson to take the solo—if, indeed, he casually added, it were not better to let the tenor sing it.

Now Miss Wragg had no cold at all. She knew it, and she knew that the choir knew it too. She said, in a tone decisive, to be sure, yet mild enough for her:

"I think, ladies and gentlemen, that I will take the solo this time." And she added, in an absent, melancholy way, that she would try and rest.

No reply was made, and the rehearsal closed in a moody, sullen manner enough to all concerned. The singers, instead of lingering, as otherwise, over to the rector's house, and officially informed that portentous clergyman that Miss Wragg was to sing in that choir on Christmas-day the most stupendous solo Miss Johnson corroborated this view of the case, and even the tenor, in his heart of hearts, was glad he would not play the organ any longer for Matilda Ann Wragg, even if she was poor old Parson Wragg's daughter.

Poor Mr. Watkins was frightened nearly out of his wits; but he was spurred on by his choir, by his desire to have gifts for the Sunday-school, and by a vague sense of relief which even the mere prospect of Miss Wragg's downfall afforded him. Let, after all, she was a parishioner of his, and he knew better than any other that under that sharp severity of manner there lay a compassionating exterior, there lay a moral strength which kept alive some of the most useful charities of his parish. He knew that when an utterly unpleasant duty, shabby, poor family were in distress and poverty, Matilda Ann Wragg was the first to visit them; and he could not forget that only the last year she had he opened the door of poor old Dame Watson's little house by the river, he noticed that the room was nearly swept, a bright fire was in the grate on the hearth, a bowl of chicken soup was warming beside it, and a gentle voice was reading these words of David:

"Whom have I in heaven but thee? And there be none upon earth that I desire beside thee."

"My flesh and my heart faileth; but God is the strength of my heart and my portion forever.

He had to look at the window before he would have recognized Matilda Ann Wragg in that voice.

So Mr. Watkins was disposed to deprecate any action on the part of his choir. Then, when he remembered that one of his old professors from the Theological Seminary—a man, too, of musical taste—used to spend Christmas with him; and what would this Mr. Gramby think of the high G of Miss Wragg? He was too timid ordinarily to venture to attempt to write a note to the lady, courteously but decidedly telling her that the interests of his parish would be endangered by her kind willingness to sing anything from the choir. Of course there were thanks for past services, in which the members of his congregation, he hoped, gratefully joined.

Poor Miss Wragg! When she had said in the choir that she would like to sing "only this time" there was a meaning in the phrase which even she herself knew, and a further significance which not even she dared avow. But now that she was told to desist her. She had, however, too much personal dignity, as well as too great a respect for the pastoral office, to venture to revisit the choir after the rector's note. For the first time for many evenings there was no light twinkling through the windows of the little front parlor of old Parson Wragg's house, and the antique, many-legged piano-forte was as silent as the quavering voice of the ex-soprano. But her! yes! there in the little kitchen sat poor old Parson Wragg by bedridden, you might have seen the attentive and sympathized old woman who was bending against the table with her face buried in her hands.

It was Christmas-eve, and busy youths and maidens were at work trimming the church with greens. The choir was arriving at a great rate, and even in the organ-loft, the clear soprano of Jane Johnson reaching the G squarely and touching the F, and there was trouble somewhere; for the little band of singers had been so used to the systematic, if despotic, management of Miss Wragg that they now had degenerated into anarchy, and more than half the rehearsal-time was spent in arguing little points which the ex-soprano would have decided by a word. They also felt a vague distrust of themselves and of their recent success, and would, if they had been rather severe on the fallen potentate whom they did not name at all, but thought of inwardly as "that poor Matilda Ann Wragg."

Suddenly there was a movement of surprise in the body of the church. The young men dropped their festoons of ivy and the girls their wreaths of evergreen; and listening, the choir heard the exclamation, repeated by several voices,

"Drowned!"

"Drowned just below the milldam. They saw the body near the shore, and Roberts, the miller, secured it."

Who was it? whispered the members of the choir to each other in alarm. But a whisper whispered they each seemed to feel that it was the late soprano.

"She had been to Widow Watson's with a basket of victuals," continued the relator of the news in the body of the church. "and Mr. Walters from Smith's Corners saw it all. He says she was walking slowly along the bank, toward dusk, singing. The wind was blowing toward him, and he could hear the words. He says they were from the Te Deum." When Thou tookest upon Thee to deliver man, Thou didst humble Thyself to be born of a virgin."

Each member of the listening choir felt a sudden thrill of pain. These were the words of the soprano solo.

"She walked on," said the man, "to near the highest part of the bank, just above the bridge, when her foot slipped and she fell over the ledge. Walters says she gave a scream and tried to save herself by grabbing at the grass, but that there was nothing to grasp hold of, and soon she was out of sight. The current swept her away, and when Walters and the others saw her floating down by the mill it was too late."

The appalled group at the church after this intelligence put up the greens quickly, though sadly, and there was no more rehearsing by the choir. An event so unusual was startling enough to the people of a quiet country village.

Christmas of last year came on a Friday, and on the Sunday following the funeral of Miss Wragg took place in the little church. Many came who had never been there before. The High Church minister from Hoboken was there; but besides him there were many poor people from the factory town near Rulford, and they all had a kind regretful word and a pitying look for the parson's daughter, who, cross as she looked, was always so ready to come to them when they were sick or in misery; and the people of the village, where she had lived so long unappreciated, began to doubt whether they had ever really known the old maid. Had they not entertained an angel unawares?

The members of the choir agreed among themselves to take care of the dead lady's pastoral charge, the old Widow Watson; and Jane Johnson and Ella Snow went to see the poor old creature the very day after the funeral. She was quite voiceless enough in her sorrow: and, not knowing how the unconscious ears around the south of her bearers, she told them how Miss Wragg had talked to her about the choir; and how she had said she knew that Jane's voice was harsh and thin; and how she had meant to give way to younger and better singers, but wanted to sing so much on that Christmas-day, for it was the last time she expected that very Christmas since—; and then she burst into tears.

Old Mrs. Watson further said that, after a few moments, Miss Wragg took from her bosom a locket and showed it to her a portrait. "I knowed who it was," added the bereaved old woman—"it was the young clergyman of Rulford—a helper to Parson Wragg—years and years ago, before I lost my boys, by years ago or more. But I never supposed before that he was any thing to Matilda Ann—I never should have guessed it, ma'am. Well, well, after all, I knowed her better than any of you."

Do we really know any of those whom we meet day by day? Do not others near us seem to wander whose outward mannerisms lie hidden the love, the sorrow, the tragedy, the "beauty of holiness" which made our poor sopranos one of those who will be His in the day when He shall make up His jewels?

MRS. BUSWELL'S CHRISTMAS.

BY HARRIET E. PRESCOTT.

THE happy mother of three sons three years ago. All grown to fine manhood. For when the boys came in to her, all on fire with the spirit that was breathed in from the very atmosphere of those days, that low wan fire, she said, would have helped them strap on their knapsacks had she been needed at the work. As it was, she knit their socks and mended their Bibles, and sent them off, stout-hearted, with a dry eye.

The eye was not so dry one summer day not long after, the day of M'Dowell's Bull Run—two of the boys never rose from that battle-field. Still she was a proud mother. She gloried over her dead, as afterward, all to preserve this cherished name of country. It went far to console her.

And there remained Will. What a boy he was now, to be sure! How ardent, how heroic, how tender, how compassionate! What an eye he had, large, gray-violet, and liked, looking straight through you! What a brow! Such a noble, broad bend as the brown hair parted from it! There was something in just that one lock of bright hair and the incessant, childlike way of its falling that must appeal to every woman's heart. It did to Nelly Sanderson's—that, or something else, or all together.

And the good it did you to hear his laugh—his mirth that seemed to carry the very warmth through your very heart as you listened. A handsome, merry boy: a boy to be proud of. Yes, she was. Blessed are the pure in heart! And so Mrs. Buswell's thoughts kept running.

That Frank would be injured in the battle in which he died was a comfort to her mind as certain as was that Christmas-day would come. Frank was to be with her on Christmas-day—that was all arranged; when he was to tell her about Will and Jack—about the last words, their last deeds, their last looks—the two boys whom she had watched from childhood from manhood, and who in those three years had grown back again to be as tender memories as the babies and long before.

Then, all told, Nelly Sanderson would come in and sit beside him, and look across to her for admiring sympathy in every thing he said and every thing he did; and perhaps—who knew?—Frank had promise of promotion—before he went back to the cruel war again, he would leave Nelly with her to stay forever her own daughter; for Frank and Nelly had been engaged something, into which though she knew about it, she had never obtruded herself.

How eagerly Mrs. Buswell set her house in order now that Frank at last was coming! In order it always was; she had to displace every thing that she might put all to rights afresh, and satisfy herself. The britannia shone, the chintz sparkled, and the linen was like a smooth snow-drift. And such pies as there were in the pantry: puffs and patties, jelly-tarts, each one a picture in crimson and snow: a great brawn; the cold ducks brown from the spit and, down cellar, home-grown's great turkey lately asking to be basted! Mrs. Buswell smoothed down her apron in complacency, and betook herself to his bedroom. Every thing there was white and sweet; the bed a refreshment to tired limbs to look at—very like he couldn't sleep in it, he said, himself so accustomed to hardship; the toilet-covers dazzling; the prayer-book open at the Thanksgiving service; and, remembering that Nelly Sanderson had brought in—a cluster of red-berried roses—all blooming in the white vase, for the room was just warmed from the sun-rays. Mrs. Buswell went and hid her face in the pillow where her boy's head would lie that night. Perhaps she was ashamed that even the empty room and the walls—save one for the slips of engravings the boy had pinned up there from the illustrated weeklies—should find should see the smile that kept growing broader and broader upon it, till, from sheer happiness, it was nothing but a smothered laugh. Yet, when she raised her head the place was wet, after all, with tears.

It was well for Mrs. Buswell that in that happy moment she touched the fountain of which her springs it saved poor heart and brain much racking. She had need of all her wits, and more than her wits, in another room, she went in and found the rector there awaiting her. It gave a single plunge, and then her heart became like a stone in her left side. She knew what his entrance in that way meant even before he turned his sad, quiet face, accustomed to such errands, to her. For a moment she could bring grave black and swarm before her; she staggered to a chair. "Is it Will?" she dryly asked, with her hands outstretched, "you needn't tell me, if it is—I'll be it now. My boy's with his brothers!"

She understood what the rector had come to tell her. Of all his company going gayly into the engagement but ten had come out alive, and he was not among them. And since no words were there which would avail for consolation, the ministers of Heaven knelt beside her and offered up his prayers, which could to life here will in purpose. But Mrs. Buswell's heart was too heavy to be dragged from its depths. Frank was to have been with her on Christmas-day, but she sat at his moment, and now the place was empty, empty as a grave. Oh, that grave was full—full and heaped up, in the black place his dear white suffering face—the little baby once that had slept on her bosom—and the brave, handsome, gallant, fearless one of all, of all her blossoms fallen, and the thorny old stem left! And Mrs. Buswell broke into a storm of sobbing, which, for the relief of them all, the ministers neared Nelly, the orphan Nelly, her dead boy's sweet-heart. "He was all she had," said Mrs. Buswell. "Oh! he was all I had, he!"

So Nelly was sent for, and all unsuspicously and happily, full of pleasant expectation, and pleasure, came over. Once every moment had brought her it a fear, but now had not Providence itself halted in its superlicence to sending them all such a one promise that he would be with them on Christmas-day?

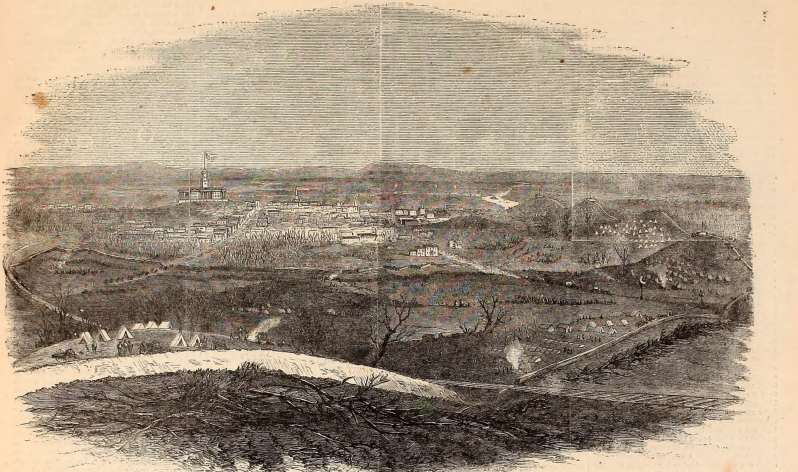
Mrs. Buswell, feeling the work before her, had tried to dry her face and to compose herself for a brief while. She called Nelly in a trembling voice from Frank's room. And without knowing why, Nelly trembled in unison. Then, as gently as speech could do it, the mother essayed to break the matter to her, till, hurriedly, finding it beyond her own strength, she flung her arms about her and clasped the girl to her breast, for she should never see Frank any more. And far from comforting her, as she hung upon her there, under the potency of the blessed Christian name, the girl seemed slowly growing into a petrifaction herself, and though Mrs. Buswell helped her to the bed, and sobbed her face into her hands as well, she utterly neither wept nor groan, only looked at her with wide-open wonder. Then, at last, Mrs. Buswell endeavored to repeat to her all that the good rector had said to herself, for though at the moment she had seemed to pay it no heed, it had evidently lived into her heart as a picture might be stamped upon a plate left in the camera uncovered by its black face-cloth. And Nelly had listened to the lie of no use. Then Buswell gave way to her own grief again, and it seemed to her that she raised and supported the poor girl, who would lose Nelly also. "Oh, that was because I was so ungrateful and said I had nothing left!" she cried.

"You need not fret about me, Mrs. Buswell," said Nelly at last, feebly and brokenly. "I shall do very well. I am content God should take from me he lent him to us a long while. All the bitterness of the time to come I gave him. Only I—I—it seems—now that it is all confirmed—to take the life out of me, so take my life with it. Besides, you have me though you were expectin' him."

"I did expect him!" sobbed Mrs. Buswell. "He was going to tell me all about my Will and Jack. Now I must go on and on all alone. I never shall know about him either, how it was, or when. Oh! with his head in the black earth, the fine curly head that I used to kiss after his father died lay here and nestled in my neck! And there's his mother, and she'll be with him, and I'll be left like he might use it and launch when he first opened the door, with its turnover in it, and its bunch of raisins, and its cocoa-nut cake. Oh! but I can't live! can't live down? Oh! the Christmases we used to have, with the little white night-gowns and the bare feet pattering about the floor at daybreak. Oh, they're all gone!—I thought we'd have them over again in Frank's children. But now—" And lying down beside Nelly, and drawing some clothes up over them, Mrs. Buswell lay sighing and complaining, sometimes also praying by turns, till from the exhaustion occasioned by her grief she slept, and Nelly, to whom, in an alarm at the great wide-open eyes she had first administered an opiate, at last slept too.

Perhaps there is nothing in the world like that first awakening after any sudden sorrow. One has the whole blow over again, and that at an instant before the faculties are fully equal to the shock. Nelly did not wake. Mrs. Buswell sat up shivering on the outside of the bed, piled some blankets over her yet unconscious companion, slipped off and away to bathe the fire and be where again she might know the wild abandonment to tears and cries without disturbing any out to be her witness, for with time comes reserve. But by-and-by, when, feeling as if such vehement misery were wrong, she hesitated herself over more about the piece, every thing seemed made to stab her. All the gathered goods in her pantry cruelly smote the good-housewife's soul: there would be plenty of Christmas-leggues though before soon to divide it with; she could send her neighbors, to some neighbors. Joy had come home, some mother whom Heaven had not stripped of every thing, and her heart grew hard and angry. She took her afternoon cup of tea —for Nelly still slept as she had lain down in her clothes on the outside of the bed—and she made a bitter wish her tears. Then with the inflexible instinct of her kind, she swept and scoured all bright and clean again, as if it were necessary for her to outtreat every outside brilliancy with the darkness of her spirit within. There still hung the stocking from the mantel-shelf, filled, as she had left it, with all the reminiscences of his boyhood, filled too with dainty nickknacks of Nelly's needle-work, such things as are never concluded to any one's boyhood's age, but a happy sense of laughing and caressing she had pictured to herself when he should have taken her down and he should be to comment on his awkward knees. Now those dead hands would never lighten it; he had not the heart to take it down herself. Walking to and fro, she went to the window, perhaps attracted by the whistle of the express-train rustling over the valley; all was such clear crystalline weather outside, from such a throne of azure the sun was scattering his golden shafts, such fine and dazzling rays of snow, such white and deep drifts along the fields, all was so pure, so bright, so fresh, and in the midst she glad church bells began to ring out their burden of blessing and rejoicing. Mrs. Buswell turned away and went again into the inner room, and there, as the prayer-book opened her glance, still open as on yesterday, something bent her knee and her spirit, and she kneeled, repeating the words unless her lid unable to see them, for the fast-falling showers of warm tears anew, she found it in her heart at last to thank God with words of her own that she had taken her darling into the folds and trials of earth to Himself.

And as she still knelt there, her head bowed upon the the page, she heard the outer door open and shut with a quick clam. She paid it no attention. Then the handle of the inner door turned, and there was a foot upon the floor. It was some neighbor to see if she wanted a good turn, she said vaguely to herself—but in a moment, as the foot crossed and came nearer—that a neighbor's step? Never! What had happened? Was the earth quaking and shaking and rolling away from under her feet? Had the heavens fallen, and had she caught Frank again, or was it he, the great brown fellow, the stalwart bearded hero of a hundred fights, who had caught her and tossed her in his arms and kissed her face all over from crown to chin as cup-fond as if she were a child and not he? And Mrs. Buswell, all herself again, returned the saucy intruder a round box on the ear for the deep deed, and then, for the first place twenty times to pay for it, so soon as it came her turn for kissing; and as suddenly, to make the round of her admonition complete, burst into tears, such different tears from all the rest she had shed, and wiped them away with his neckcloth, and found something told Frank that mother and son were not alone in the room; he looked anxiously, uncertainly by about; and then the blankets piled above Nelly,



ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—NASHVILLE AND ITS FORTIFICATIONS.

WILSON'S cavalry in the mean while advanced until it rested on the hills six miles from Nashville. A new line was formed, and our forces were ready for the attack on this by 5 P.M. The charge was made in the face of a fire which would have been intolerable if the rebels had not fired too high; but when the works were reached their defenders fled in confusion, leaving their cannon and many prisoners behind them. It was now too late to pursue the advantage. The day's work was over, and THOMAS had to show for it long lines of intrenchments captured from the enemy, sixteen guns, and over a thousand prisoners.

The next day brought still more glorious results. WILSON'S cavalry turned the left of their new line and captured many prisoners. SCHOFIELD carried several hills, capturing six guns and many prisoners. SMITH carried the salient point of the enemy's line, capturing sixteen guns, two Brigadier-Generals, and about two thousand prisoners. This with one of his divisions: the other—GEARY'S—captured the intrenchments in its front, with all the artillery and troops left in them. WOOD, next on the left, took up the assault, carrying intrenchments, with eight guns and six hundred prisoners. In the mean time General R. W. JOHNSON, in cooperation with the gun-boats, drove the rebels from their batteries below Nashville, capturing a large number of prisoners. All day HOOD had been falling back, having during the previous night withdrawn his right and taken up a position covering his line of retreat on Franklin.

On the 17th HOOD was pressed beyond Franklin, where he left behind him 1500 wounded. His front and flanks were infested with perpetual attack. While passing through Franklin KNOPF's cavalry division captured five battle-flags and 250 prisoners. JOHNSON struck his flank beyond Franklin, capturing a large number of prisoners.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.

A COMPLETE revolution seems to have taken place in the modes during the past twelvemonth. Such strange and such curious costumes have rarely been seen in so short an interval, during which ladies perfectly comme il faut have alternately, not to say sometimes simultaneously, patronized bodices, coats, canes, and coquettes, without, after all, sacrificing any of their personal attractions, which, fortunately, they can not abdicate by any fashion-freak. The latest sign of this closing season of artifice is the open announcement, by the principal coiffure, of ringlets at so much per dozen, for wearing under the bonnet or by the side of a bow!

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Walking Dress.—Gray poplin robe, trimmed on the body and skirt with black dentated velvet and long chenille fringe, disposed in the manner shown in our illustration. The corsage is a basques, and open in front as well as behind. The ceinture, placed underneath, is fastened by two buckles, one in front and the other at the back of the waist. Rose-colored velvet bonnet, ornamented with flowers on one side only; the chemisette depicted in this figure forms at the same time the crown and the bavolet.

Fig. 2. Ball Dress.—Robe of white tulle over satin skirt ornamented with a deep ruched flounce. The ruche de bal (so which the name of the Harmonia has been given) is an angle cashmere remedy, embroidered with red cashmere representing branches of coral. The trimming round the edge is composed of black and white velvet balls, from which depends a fringe in white yak. The corbeille is a mixture of gold, red, and white, and is also provided with the wreath-cloth, red and yak fringe.

Fig. 3. Chevelure Dress.—Brown velvet robe, buttoning behind throughout. The principal feature of the figure is the Rémonier pelerine. It is velvet, ornamented with passementerie chevelure. The simplicity of this small pelerine renders further explanation unnecessary.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER, 1864.

A PRODIGY.

HAVING carefully examined, ourselves, in all its details, the charming little new TEN Dollar Sewing Machine (the "little Prodigy") that has appeared at the horizon of the thousand and one discoveries of the day, we have come to the conclusion that it is impossible to find a conception, in the realm of mechanical art, so complete, combining so singular a practical utility with a price so very moderate. Usefulness, prettiness, cheapness, all are there, and in a quasi Lilliputian compass; it is the multum in parvo of the ancients. At the eve of the holidays it is a good fortune; and exporters have, also, on their side, a favorable opportunity to save in Europe, Havana, and South America, to the purses which unloosen their strings, at the advent of the new year, the articles of their choice.—Courrier des Etats Unis, Dec. 13, 1864.

The above little prodigy (the only perfect machine of its kind) is for sale at WHEELER & WILSON'S, 237 Broadway, New York (in the store). Sent, packed in a practical box, with all the necessary complements, as well as very FULL PRACTICAL DIRECTIONS, to all parts, on receipt of $10. Address J. P. RICHTER, General Agent, 487 Broadway, New York. (See advertisement of "A Little Prodigy.") Beware of inferior imitations.

TESTIMONIAL FROM THE MOST DISTINGUISHED ARTISTS
To STEINWAY & SONS.
New York, December, 1864.
The Piano Fortes, Grand, Square, and Upright, manufactured by Messrs. Steinway & Sons, have established for themselves a well-earned reputation that it is hardly possible for us to add any thing to his just fame. Having thoroughly tested their instruments personally for years, both in public and private, it becomes our pleasant duty to express our candid opinion regarding their unparalleled excellence—for we have always known them.
Among the chief points of their uniform excellence are: Great but genuine depth, richness, and volume of tone, combined with a rare brilliancy, clearness, and perfect evenness throughout the entire scale, and above all a surpassing duration of sound, the just and unquestionable quality of which never shall or under the most delicate or powerful touch. This peculiarity is found exclusively in the Steinway Pianos, and together with the matchless promptness, elasticity, and promptness of action always characterizing these instruments, as well as their unequaled durability on the the severest trials, is truly surprising, and claims at once the admiration of every artist. We therefore, consider the "Steinway" Pianos in all respects by far the best instruments made in this country or Europe, in musical quality and exclusively ourselves, in public or private, and recommend them invariably to our friends and the public.
We have at different times expressed our opinion regarding the merits of various pianos here, but feel ourselves unhesitatingly pronounce Messrs. Steinway & Sons' Pianos, both in regard to power, transparently superior tone and touch.

ROYAL VICTORIA HOTEL.
This Hotel, situated at NASSAU, NEW PROVIDENCE, BAHAMAS, was built by the Colonial Government, and is a handsome three-story building, erected on an elevation a few minutes' walk from the shore, and commanding a fine view of the ocean, harbor, and town of Nassau.
Surrounding the Hotel is a piazza ten feet wide, from which the inmates can at all times enjoy the gentle, cooling, westerly trade-winds. INVALIDS unable to bear much fatigue will have a promenade extending one thousand feet, without leaving the building. All of the TROPICAL FRUITS grow in great abundance, and are to receive the entire wint.r.
But little rain falls from the month of October to the first of June. THIS IS CONSIDERED THE PECULIAR SEASON FOR INVALIDS, though they can reside the entire year with comfort and safety. The rooms are spacious, aerated, and kept in good order. A most BEAUTIFUL DRIVE extends for twelve miles along the sea shore. In fact, every thing combines to make it a pleasant home for the robust as well as for the invalid.
The Lessee of the Hotel has recently secured the services of Mr. James Carroll, late of the "NEW YORK HOTEL," who will have the same superintendence, and is determined to do all in his power to minister to the wants and comforts of his guests.
The CULINARY and other departments shall be well supplied, the rooms the best obtainable, and the servants attentive and unobtrusive.
The CUNARD CO.'S STEAM-SHIP CORSICA leaves the wharf at Jersey City and New York once a month for Nassau. The fare to Nassau is forty-five dollars. The charges for board are Three Dollars (3) 00 per day.
Carriages and saddle horses can be hired at moderate rates. GEO. O JOHNSON, Lessee.
